Asylum seekers with killer diseases exploit legal loophole to avoid deportation

Got Aids? We come to Britain

EXCLUSIVE
By Paul McMillan

ASYLUM seekers with Aids, TB and other killer diseases are gaining permanent entry to Britain by exploiting a dangerous loophole in the law.

The loophole, discovered by a Tanzanian woman and her lawyers, relates to an article in the European Convention of Human Rights.

All that needs to be proven is that the asylum seeker is suffering from a life-threatening disease and that health care in their country of origin is not up to first world standards.

And today we can reveal how Hindu Mwakishi, 37, was set to be deported back to Tanzania until she appealed under article three of the Human Rights Act, relating to "medical grounds".

She is believed to have been in the UK for five years and had exhausted all her appeals to remain longer.

But then she produced her trump card - a medical certificate stating she is HIV positive.

She claimed her life was in "imminent danger" back home simply because its third world facilities were inadequate. An adjudicator was forced to rule in her favour, allowing her to stay.

Miss Mwakishi has also landed a job as a care worker at a London law firm, advising other asylum seekers how to beat the deportation system.

Last Friday she happily revealed to the Sunday Express: "I am HIV positive. I am HIV positive, yes I am most definitely."

"I told my boss and everyone and I have a certificate to prove it and I now have the right to stay in this country."

With 130,000 people awaiting deportation from Britain, the Foreign Office were forced to admit that while Miss Mwakishi came from exceptionally poor Tanzania, the criteria in her case apply virtually across all of Africa.

A spokesman said: "Medical care is seen as sufficiently poor in most parts of Africa, which would give most people very good grounds to stay if infected by a potentially lethal illness."

People dying of Aids, Ebola and TB in Africa far outnumber the entire population of Britain. A tiny percentage would quickly bankrupt the health service.

But it now appears they only have to set foot on British soil and they have the right to stay until cured. Venues like HIV are never removed from the body - so that means for life. The cost of retroviral drug treatment to stop HIV turning into full-blown Aids is nearly £15,000 a year. But many asylum seekers have already started to develop the disease and for them cost of treatment can be 10 times higher.

Dr Anthony Eastanger, director of the renal unit at St Helier Hospital, in Carshalton, Surrey, spoke out after his hospital had to meet a £150,000 bill for a Ghanaian patient suffering from Aids and kidney failure.

He said: "Everyone felt sorry for the chap but we cannot provide a health service for the world."

"His family said he was applying for asylum. I can think of no reason why anyone would need asylum from Ghana but you can't blame them for applying. What I find so annoying is that both the Department of Health and the Home Office end up winning their hands of these people and the hospitals have to foot the bill."

The Department of Health said it keeps no records of the number of foreigners or asylum seekers treated in British hospitals.

But the Home Office admitted they were fighting a losing battle to deport medical refugees.

A spokeswoman, keen not to turn a deluge into a flood, said: "There is by no means a blanket 'yes, you can stay because you have HIV, Aids or some other untreatable virus'. It's on a case by case basis."

But she admitted: "We have an obligation under the Human Rights Act, section three which deals with applications on medical grounds. It says people can stay if there is an imminent fear of death if deported. If you come from California, where there are very good facilities, you would be turned down. But if you come from a country where facilities are poor, a serious viral illness could be considered as an exceptional, compassionate and compelling argument to stay."

The cost of treatment in the UK does not come into it at all."

Miss Mwakishi now works for solicitors Lawson, Turner and Gilbert in plush Docklands offices, where the car park is stacked with Mercedes and taxis.

Her boss Mr Galtin said: "We do not employ illegal asylum seekers. She is one here legally, she is very good at her job and we support her."

He added: "Since specialising in immigration this legal practice it really going places."

They have plenty of clients. Over the past two years 150,000 asylum seekers have been refused entry but fewer than 25,000 have actually been removed.

More and more are turning to companies like Lawson, Turner and Gilbert to find a way round deportation. The firm also has an office in Dover.

The number of Aids cases among heterosexuals in Britain is rising at a faster rate than ever. Last year 1,819 cases were diagnosed, of which 71 per cent were among Africans. Six far, 1,248 people have died of the disease in Britain.

Surprisingly, since her diagnosis Miss Mwakishi has not bothered to go back to her doctors for treatment, the availability of which was the basis of her asylum claim.

Her case has angered Tory MP David Amess, a member of the Health Select Committee.

He said: "The UK has a real problem with its health service at the moment and I don't think UK residents will be pleased if this loophole is abused in this way."

The Home Secretary David Blunkett needs to explain in detail the repercussions of the case to the House of Commons.

WHAT WE THINK

Some Middle East realities

In the midst of a wide diversity of highly emotive commentaries on the current situation in Palestine, a welcome shaft of light was cast by Andrew Alexander, writing in the Daily Mail of the 19th April. Said Alexander:-

"There is far too much talk in the Arab-Israeli crisis about right and wrong. The essence of diplomacy is not right and wrong or good and bad. It is about peace and war. We are threatened by a dangerous and worsening conflict which, if it persists, could destabilise the Middle East with consequences which would be felt worldwide and certainly in Britain.

"It is a side issue now who are the goodies and baddies. The point is that both sides are convinced of the righteousness of their cause."

Though this is far from the complete picture, it does form some framework for the issue to be judged. From the strict British standpoint, what matters about the Middle East crisis is simply and solely how it affects us; it should be a matter of supreme indifference to Britain whether one or another group of Middle Easterners occupy a particular tiny piece of land far from our shores – unless certain essential national interests are affected by this issue. This question must be judged completely independently of whether we sympathise with the Arabs or the Israelis. Sympathy is a matter of personal feeling; national interests are a matter of cool, sober judgement in which feelings should play no part.

Nationalist comment

DEALING WITH THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Alexander speaks of consequences affecting Britain. There are two essential respects in which this is true. Britain, like all industrial nations, is affected by anything which interferes with the necessary flow of Middle Eastern oil to its economy – and that is the most vital issue. But we are also affected in another way. Here we must distinguish between Britain as we would like it to be – a nation under a government dedicated single-mindedly and exclusively to British interests and not swayed by any other considerations – and the nation we are today: one governed by a set of politicians of globalist loyalty and inclination, indifferent to real British interests, heavily committed to the support of Zionism by way of the immense power of the Jewish lobby both here and across the Atlantic – and, not least, responsive to every gust of wind, large or small, from the mass media and public opinion, which in turn exploit – or are swayed by – popular emotion.

This is important – even if it should not be. Whereas Alexander is right in saying that the question of who are the goodies and who are the baddies is only a side issue, it is a political fact that popular perceptions of good and bad, right and wrong, have an immense bearing on policies likely to be adopted and therefore likely to affect us.

And here is where we are witnessing some dramatic developments. The totally callous and brutal actions of the Israeli armed forces and police in the occupied territories – actions which, from a vast weight of evidence, go far beyond necessary counter-terrorist measures – have caused such outrage that the mass media, disposed almost viscerally to be pro-Jewish, have not been able to ignore them. Journalists reporting from the spot – journalists, mark you, predisposed from way back in their student days towards philo-Semitic attitudes – have simply been forced to take account of the evidence before their very eyes. The result is that the British public is seeing another side to the race which for the past sixty years or so has been treated always as the victim of brutality and consequently as beyond criticism. Also, many who in the past, for fear of being dubbed 'anti-Semites', have hesitated to condemn Jewish actions are now shaking off that inhibition as they see that others are freeing themselves from the same shackles and speaking openly. This is causing tremendous alarm in Jewish quarters, and has provoked the Chief Rabbi, Jonathan Sacks, no less, to observe that 'anti-Semitism' in Britain is at the highest level for many years, perhaps since the 1930s.

We should of course understand straight-away what the Rabbi means by 'anti-Semitism'. No civilised person wants to see Jews singled out for hostility just because they are Jews, but all reasonable people should wish to see an open and honest debate about Jewish matters in which Jews are no more immune to criticism than the rest of us. This is what is happening at long last, and this is what scares the daylight out of Mr. Sacks and his kind, many of whom are accustomed to thinking of themselves as an exclusively protected species whose good and bad points of behaviour may never be discussed as are those of the rest of us. When we say that the British public is now seeing another side to this race, what we mean is that the faults of the Jews (or at least some of them) are being revealed – to be measured against the virtues, just as is fair with British people, Germans, French, Eskimos and others. Many Jews, including some very powerful ones, would prefer that this not be permitted; but whether they like it or not, it is happening.

In that regard, what is going on right now in the Israel/Palestine region is having undoubted effects in this country. It is tragic that it is taking great human suffering for this to come about, but that is something we cannot alter. Often it happens that out of suffering comes truth.

And the truth is important to us in Britain because it bears on matters far wider than this local Middle Eastern quarrel. It helps to inform our attitude towards Zionism worldwide, which in its turn affects areas of British life too numerous to list in this short analysis. Zionism – the wider Zionism, that is – crucially influences British policy both foreign and domestic, and we believe that this influence is mostly not for the good. If events in the Middle East play some role in changing British perceptions of Zionism, and these in turn eventually lead to changes of British policy, something worthwhile will have been achieved.

Right now, almost everyone – even including comparative realists like Mr. Alexander – is saying that there must be a truce and a settlement between the Arabs and the Israelis. This flies in the face of history. History should tell us that there simply is no formula for a settlement that will ever satisfy both sides. The Arab-Israeli conflict, like the Northern Ireland conflict, is one which can only be resolved by one side winning and the other side losing. And in the end, the plain fact is that Israel cannot win. The realities of demographics and geopolitics make this clear to anyone not blinded by pro-Jewish prejudice. Israel's inevitable defeat is at the moment only being postponed by American protection, and that in turn is only being sustained by the power of the Jewish lobby in Washington – something that Americans are not going to put up with for ever.

These are the realities of the Middle Eastern conflict. Whatever side you think you're on, they won't go away. British policy must, at the end of the day, be determined by realities – and how those realities affect Britain itself. Today's politicians will not accept this; tomorrow's politicians will have to.

An extraordinary statement

Last month we had occasion to focus on the affair of Commander Brian Paddick, permitted to get away with grossly inadequate anti-drug measures in London's Lambeth Division because he had the protection of Metropolitan Commissioner Sir John Stevens. Stevens also tolerated Paddick's public confession of his attraction to anarchy, and only instituted an enquiry into his behaviour when allegations were made that he had smoked cannabis in the flat he had shared with his homosexual lover. Indeed, as the lover himself acknowledged, Paddick got away with all these things for so long precisely because he was the Met's token 'gay' officer and his superiors declined to take action against him for fear of being labelled 'homophobic'.

All this must surely have prompted the question: what was Stevens doing as the top cop of a city groaning under an unprecedented crime wave, when such a job demanded a man of competence and strength? The answer, of course, is that, like virtually all really senior policemen in Britain today, Stevens owes his promotion more to his credentials in the way of political correctness than his capability in fighting criminals.

Now Stevens has given us cause for confirmation of this view. At a London conference on street crime held last month, he came out with what was surely an extraordinary confession of attitude. There was, according to him, a 'peril' in prosecuting young black offenders. The peril consisted of the fact that it would result in those offenders being branded as criminals for life. The Commissioner said that a huge drive against street robbers would lead to hundreds of black men being convicted of robbery. That would risk making them unemployable – making it more likely that they would return to crime after their release from jail. A Daily Mail report of his speech said:-

"Sir John revealed that 17,000 suspects had been arrested for a range of crimes in six weeks across London in a massive drive against soaring levels of street attacks. "Among those arrested are more than 1,000 suspected robbers, and Sir John said a large number of those caught are black."

The nature of these offences meant that those arrested had to be charged and brought into the criminal justice system. The Mail report went on to quote Sir John:-

"By bringing them into the system at such a young age, we are stigmatising them for life. "By arresting thousands of culprits, we may be reducing the incidence of street crime – and by God we need to do that. "But what we are creating is a rising generation of socially stigmatised and socially excluded youth."

Sir John, as far we know, did not actually advocate explicitly that these considerations should lead to young black offenders not being prosecuted when their actions merited prosecution, but there is the very clear inference from his words that this may well be the policy. He surely must have been aware that many senior police officers either were present at the conference or would read reports of his speech subsequently. Such officers, being career-minded, would naturally take the words of their chief as guidance in their actions and as some indication of the kind of philosophy of policing that would best help their ambitions of promotion.

In fact, these words of Sir John Stevens were utterly appalling, coming from the man who is looked up to to provide leadership in a vital war against lawbreaking which at the moment the police are losing. The plain fact is that, quite apart from being suggestive that there are cases where criminals should not be prosecuted as they should be, Sir John's words also could be taken as a hint that Blacks in particular should be treated with leniency because they were in a different category to Whites arrested for similar offences. In other words, there should be racial discrimination in reverse!

We know, of course, that this is happening. What Sir John's words have done is give implied sanction to it at the highest level. The man should be sacked forthwith – but of course he will not.

RUC: disgusting betrayal

This editor has a particular personal reason to feel outrage at what successive governments have been doing to the Royal Ulster Constabulary. His paternal grandfather was a senior officer in that body, then called the Royal Irish Constabulary. The RIC/RUC have represented a proud tradition of superb policing and service to the British Crown. Now as a reward for this service and for their valiant record as fighters against terrorism, they are being turned into something amounting to a mockery of what the force once was. The name is to go. The uniform is to go in favour of trendy baseball caps, and personnel must be 50:50 protestant and catholic – which means discrimination in favour of the latter. It's vomiting time again.

As AIDS-carriers walk in, immigration reaches stage of total insanity

THE SUNDAY EXPRESS of the 7th April carried a full-page report headed 'Got AIDS? Welcome to Britain'. That heading aptly described the sheer lunacy to which the present Government's immigration policies have now descended. The report went on to say that:-

"Asylum-seekers with AIDS, TB and other killer diseases are gaining permanent entry to Britain by exploiting a dangerous loophole in the law.

"The loophole, discovered by a Tanzanian woman and her lawyers, relates to an article in the European convention of Human Rights.

"All that needs to be proven is that the asylum-seeker is suffering from a life-threatening disease and that health care in their country of origin is not up to first world standards."

The report went on to relate the case of Hindu Mwakitosi, who was set to be deported back to Tanzania until she appealed under article three of the Human Rights Act relating to 'medical grounds'. She produced her trump card – a medical certificate stating that she is HIV-positive. She claimed her life was in imminent danger back home because Tanzania's medical facilities were inadequate. An adjudicator was forced to find in her favour, allowing her to stay.

But that's only the tip of the iceberg. Miss Mwakitosi has now landed a job at a London law firm, advising other asylum-seekers how to beat the deportation system. She was reported as happily revealing to the Sunday Express:-

"I am HIV-positive, I am HIV-positive, yes I am, most definitely! I told my boss and everyone and I have a certificate to prove it, and I now have the right to stay in this country."

MILLIONS MORE ON THE WAY?

The Sunday Express report went on to state the truth – that the number of people dying from AIDS, Ebola and TV in Africa is so vast that it far outnumbers the entire population of the United Kingdom. The mind simply boggles at the potentialities this test case has opened up for such people wanting to get to this country – potentialities which Miss Mwakitosi is now busily exploiting in the office of the firm where she works. The Sunday Express again:-

"... now it appears they only have to set foot on British soil and they have the right to stay until cured. Viruses like HIV are never removed from the body – so that means for life. The cost of retroviral drug treatment to stop HIV turning into full-blown AIDS is nearly £15,000 a year. But many asylum-seekers have already started to develop the disease and for them the cost of treatment can be ten times higher."

This, of course, is only about the financial costs to the Health Service in Britain. That is important enough at a time when we have just been informed of big tax increases in order to provide more health funding.

But as to the wider costs to general public health of having untold numbers of new people roaming about this country carrying diseases that could infect anyone near them, we wonder whether anyone at official level has even started to think about the ramifications of these – or, if they have, whether there is, anywhere, the political will to take the necessary action.

And action is becoming imperative. Said the Sunday Express:-

"The number AIDS cases among heterosexuals in Britain is rising at a faster rate than ever. Last year, 1,819 cases were diagnosed, of which 71 per cent were among Africans. So far, 12,248 people have died of the disease in Britain."

And what does the Home Office say about this potential danger being increased a hundred-fold? One spokeswoman was quoted as saying:-

"We have an obligation under the Human Rights Act section three which deals with applications on medical grounds. It says people can stay if there is an imminent fear of death if deported... if you come from a country where facilities are poor, a serious viral illness could be considered as an exceptional, com- passionate and compelling argument to stay."

So there we have it. In the name of 'Human Rights', the whole future of the indigenous British population must be placed in jeopardy.

The things they're saying

How can we accept that, having once been the workshop of the world, we now hardly make anything worthwhile in this country? How can our pride allow us simply to be a service-led economy where our talent is exported to allow other nations to make the things we invent and design?

... Our lack of success in manufacturing in this country is far more due to the short-termism of our financial institutions, which want instant profits and do not encourage long-term investment or long-term research, design or development. Added to this is the attitude of our educationalists, who firmly believe that a job in manufacturing is like consigning their pupils to everlasting damnation. We really do seem to have lost the passion for manufacturing in our country – we must regain it. Man and his country cannot live healthily by service industries alone.

SIR TERENCE CONRAN
The Sunday Times (14.4.02)

... Whatever Bush, Blair and the rest of them think, the world is not reasonable. The existence of Israel itself, a unique kind of state based on an ancient prophecy and an eternal wrong, is not reasonable. Its right to exist, which the Arabs will never accept, rests not on reasonable arguments but on its own ability to fight for its existence by any means available, however distasteful this may seem to the 'international community'.

Not reason, but ancient elemental forces, racial and historical memories, even traces of that romantic revolt against reason sometimes called fascism, are working here, and on both sides.

PETER SIMPLE
Daily Telegraph (12.4.02)

Saddam's so-called 'weapons of mass destruction', which are the reason why Mr. Blair and Mr. Bush are preparing for war against the Iraqi leader, remain so far illusory and incapable of proof.

No such mystery attaches to Mr. Sharon's weapons of mass destruction – several hundred nuclear warheads – though these are not considered by Mr. Blair or Mr. Bush to constitute any kind of threat to world peace.

RICHARD INGRAMS
The Observer (31.3.02)

They are at it again. Despite the unfinished business in Afghanistan, the Iraqis have lost little time in trying to whip up support for their long-desired cluster-bombing of Baghdad – or nuclear bombing, if our 'humanitarian' Defence Secretary Geoff Hoon is to have his way.

In the countdown to military action we must brace ourselves for the usual round of Saddam scare stories which inevitably signal that an attack on Iraq is imminent. Super-guns, killer agents and anthrax in our reservoirs: whatever it is, rest assured that those dastardly Iraqis will be planning it in the weeks and months ahead.

Before the B52s set off and the propaganda war goes into overdrive, it is surely worth considering a little more closely why on earth all this is happening. Why is a 'régime change' in Baghdad considered so desirable, even at the extent of risking a major Middle East war?

NEIL CLARK
The Spectator (30.3.02)

It is the job of soldiers to kill the enemy and take ground. It is often their duty to die or be terribly injured. There is no point in being sentimental about it.

This harsh bargain is justified only if they really are doing their duty to the country. I can think of no good reason why British soldiers should be in Afghanistan. I have never believed that the September 11 attack was planned there...

It is also absurd for Mr. Blair to pose as the foe of terror while he grants the IRA its every wish.

Parading as a fake strongman in a TV studio is demeaning. Sending real men into mortal danger so as to polish your image is despicable.

PETER HITCHENS
The Mail on Sunday (24.3.02)

... Can one criticise the Jewish state, a major actor in a very important part of the world, without being painted an anti-Semite, or is Israel and its defendants immune from reproach? What I do know is that an all-powerful Israeli lobby defending Israel's interests goes into overdrive the moment Israel is criticised... Here's my take at what's happening in that unhappy part of the world. Palestinians feel they finally have a weapon that balances the power of the United States-equipped Israeli army: the suicide bomber. And I'll go further. The suicide bomber is a creation of Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. Israel may be the only democracy in the region, but depriving people of the right to equality and freedom, and keeping them under occupation, is hardly a democratic act.

TAKI
The Spectator (6.4.02)

Who would have believed, 50 years ago, that by the end of the century the foulest language and vilest pornography would be commonplace on television, or that we would have a government legislating to break up the United Kingdom, barely bothering to conceal its republican bent, rashly declaring war on

Moslem terrorism which did not threaten us, while crawling abjectly to the IRA and even assisting it by releasing murderers from prison?

A government making a criminal out of an honest shopkeeper because he sold in pounds and ounces, and jailing for life a decent householder who dared to defend his home by shooting a burglar.

A government refusing to take any effective action against violent crime, encouraging sexual perversion by lowering the age of consent and drug abuse by relaxing the law on cannabis, and legislating for women to serve in the front line (while the gallant warriors of Westminster sit snug and safe).

A government showing itself dead to any notion of patriotism and even discouraging the use of the word 'British', falling over itself to destroy our institutions simply because it is frightened of offending hostile aliens.

GEORGE MACDONALD FRASER
Daily Mail (15.4.02)

Something is happening in Britain that happened in America in the 1960s and 1970s: whole areas of cities are being surrendered to an underclass. In London, although we have yet to see Mayfair, Belgravia or Chelsea taken over by menacing Albanian 'illegals', residents of premium areas are banding together to hire private security patrols, and people are afraid to wear their Rolexes out of doors. Even in the most salubrious streets, few relish going for a walk after nightfall. In America, the authorities – by a policy of zero tolerance – have been largely successful in reclaiming the streets from the criminal. Here there has been no effort to do so, and there is unlikely to be one.

SIMON HEFFER
The Spectator (30.3.02)

Our rulers do not actually believe in punishing crime. They like taxation. They despise marriage. They are ashamed of Britain. They long to impose European Union regulation and interference on every aspect of our lives, because they actively like that sort of thing.

They work to get rid of our ancient liberties – jury trial and habeas corpus – and replace them with useless 'human rights', which mostly benefit criminals and illegal immigrants. We will end up as surfs with ID cards under CCTV surveillance, free to booze and bet and smoke dope, but not to think.

Could it be that, to distract us and dull our wits, they actively seek to stupify us with these fake pleasures?

PETER HITCHENS
The Mail on Sunday (31.3.02)

OPEN LETTER TO A CONSERVATIVE

PRINCIPLED CONSERVATIVES will surely have groaned in despair when they read of Iain Duncan Smith's statement, made in Harrogate on March 24th, that the party must show that it 'cares' about the poor, the dispossessed and the vulnerable. It is not that anyone would object to a party which was committed to help the genuinely needy in society; that should be an article of faith with every party without there being any requirement for it to say so publicly. It is only that, in the political culture of our times, such a declaration immediately sets off warning bells signalling no change from the merry-go-round of populist bribery and ingratiation that have been a feature of public life in Britain for as long as most of us can remember. There is a code by which we can immediately identify what Mr. Duncan Smith really means. It means that he just 'loves' everyone who has a vote, no matter who they may be and no matter whether they are deserving of his concern or not.

Just a month before, IDS had proclaimed that the Tories must make themselves more attractive to black and Asian voters and that the party had "not been careful enough" about the way it was perceived among ethnic minorities.

Andrew Alexander, writing in the Daily Mail a few days afterwards, caught the pitch perfectly:-

"The new message from the Conservatives after the Harrogate conference is that they care.

"Gosh, how they care! Iain Duncan Smith gets up caring and goes to bed caring. You should just see party chairman David Davis caring away all day in his office in Smith Square – though the rumour is denied that party HQ is to be renamed Caring Central Office.

They care about the rich, the poor, the old, the young, black and white, brown and yellow, abled and disabled, educated and illiterate – oh, everybody.

"It invites the obvious riposte that the party doth protest too much.

"Two things in particular make me uneasy about the way this is trumpeted as the new Conservatism.

"It is remarkably unsubtle. It carries the clear implication that the party didn't 'care' before, which devalues its inheritance. It may also promote suspicion about the reliability of this apparent conversion.

"The other problem about the party proclaiming that it is 'caring' and 'compassionate' – it also did under Ted Heath, by the way – is that its campaign to prove the point is likely to take us even further down the road to the Nanny State.

JOHN TYNDALL examines common ideals, and differences, between Tories and nationalists

"Every time a problem is identified, every time a section or group in the community is seen to be in difficulties, the Tories are liable to demonstrate how much they 'care' by promising action through government.

Second part of a two-part feature

"This is not what the party chose Iain Duncan Smith for. There are ominous signs that he has fallen into the hands of the spin doctors."

DUNCAN SMITH
Self-proclaimed 'carer'

All this simply demonstrates that where the Tories under Mr. Duncan Smith are concerned, it is going to be the same old game, played under the same old rules. This will be a profound disappointment to many who had hoped that the party, at long last, might abandon its pathetic efforts to compete with Labour and the Liberal Democrats for the mythical 'centre ground', and embrace firm principles of the kind that once set it as a party apart, a party of the genuine right which, while not loved by the whole population (is that ever possible?), would at least be respected for having some identifiable convictions and showing some real leadership.

I state these things having never been a Tory myself. To me, a Conservative position is untenable in times when everything worth conserving has been thrown away, and when the enemies of what is worth conserving occupy the commanding heights of power; then, only an insurgent approach to politics offers any hope of winning back what has been lost. Nevertheless, I can respect people who, as Conservatives, are faithful to certain core beliefs underlying the origins and traditions of their party. It is clear from Mr. Duncan Smith's recent pronouncements that, like his opposite number Tony Blair, he holds no core beliefs at all but is just another modern-day politician – with all the contemptible traits associated with those words. He is interested only in obtaining political office, and will say or do anything he thinks will help him in that quest.

Society's goals

Duncan Smith's reference to the poor, the dispossessed and the vulnerable does, however, provide us with a useful cue for a discussion in which we can examine what ought to be the proper goals of a society. It is a discussion in which, I would submit, Conservatives have again and again been wrong-footed over the past half-century.

In the first part of this article published last month, I focused on the common ground that should unite true Conservatives with nationalists like myself, namely our belief in the primacy of the nation-state, of national sovereignty and national identity. We nationalists have remained steadfastly with our feet on that ground, whereas it is my contention that the Tories, as a party, have abandoned it. At the same time, a great many Tories, as individuals, remain faithful to the national idea and wish only that their leaders were of the same mind.

Let us begin, then, from this common ground of national loyalty, and then go on to explore its ramifications for the society we inhabit.

A nation does not exist in a vacuum; nor does it exist in isolation from the world around it. It has to defend its place in that world and to compete in it for its survival. That means, in the simplest terms, that it must keep itself strong – strong in its resources and resourcefulness, in its defences, in its competitiveness, in its inner health, vitality, unity, discipline and cohesion.

From these imperatives, certain ground rules flow logically. Unity and cohesion require, first of all, a sense of shared nationality – of which the foundation must be shared ethnicity, a need I spotlighted last month. This in no way stipulates that those who are not part of this shared ethnicity should be hated, only that they must be excluded. In the case of people of broadly similar racial background and culture – meaning, in the British context, most other Europeans – these can be absorbed and assimilated up to a certain numerical limit. In the case of those of vastly different racial background and culture – meaning all non-Europeans – exclusion is essential if national cohesion is to be preserved.

But that is only the start; national cohesion must mean considerably more. It must mean a contract of citizenship in which rights are balanced by duties, freedoms by obligations. In that contract, a harmony must be sought between the individual will – the very human and natural concern for self-interest on the part of every member of the group – and the will and interest of the group as a whole. And here is the rub – in situations where that harmony is not possible, where one will and interest must take priority over the other, it must always be the will and interest of the group that prevails.

This rule must govern economic activity. It must govern social policy and behaviour. And it must govern everything that we include within the classification of ‘morality’.

Individual-centred creed

And it is here that Liberalism parts company with traditional Conservatism. To the Liberal, the individual will and interest must always be paramount. All government, law and social organisation are conceived as being devised to serve individual ends. Government is there to make decisions calculated to achieve the greatest good for the greatest number of individuals. Law is seen as being necessary to protect the rights of individuals against the depredations of other individuals who threaten them. Society is looked upon merely as a contract of convenience between individuals who recognise that they can achieve more for their individual selves by co-operation than by conflict. The free individual, without obligations to society, nation or family is the ideal. The imposition of such obligations is a necessary evil based on an understanding of the imperfectibility of man in his present evolutionary phase. That is all; there is no higher goal.

And at the centre of this blissful world-picture there stands that dreaded institution, the State. The need for such a thing as the State is grudgingly accepted by Liberals – at least until such time as human perfectibility (always a Liberal dream) is further advanced. But the acceptance is a viscerally hostile one, rather as in the relationship between a prison inmate and his jailer. Everything the inmate can get away with without the jailer's interference should be engaged in as a matter of principle – after all, is it not an exercise in ‘rights’?

Authority of the State

Traditional Conservatism opposed this mentality. To Conservatives of the old type, the State was not intrinsically bad but, on the contrary, the vital bastion of order and authority without which life would degenerate. True, the State, being a human construct, could always fall into the hands of those who were either evil or incompetent. But that was not a weakness in the concept of the State as such, only a symptom of human weakness. The same human weakness would ensure that, without a strong State as society's protector, evil and incompetence would prevail much more widely and have far worse consequences. If faults existed in the State, they should be corrected within, leaving the institution intact, not by the repudiation of the State in favour of rampant individualism and a free-for-all between private vested interests.

Roger Scruton, in The Meaning of Conservatism (Pelican, 1980), castigated modern Tories for their downgrading of the value of State authority, saying:-

“Authority... is an enormous artifact. By which I mean, not that authority is intentionally constructed, but rather that it exists only in so far as men exercise, understand and submit to it. The condition of society presupposes this general connivance, and a conservative will seek to uphold all those practices and institutions – among which, of course, the family is pre-eminent – through which the habits of allegiance are acquired. As we shall see, this necessary corollary of conservative thinking is incompatible with any suggestions that the conservative is an advocate either of liberal ideals, or of the so-called ‘minimal state’. It is as possible for a conservative as it is for a socialist to be, should the need arise, ‘totalitarian’ – although, naturally, it is not the height of wisdom so to declare oneself. In fact, what is objected to as ‘totalitarian’ is not the power of the state, but power arbitrarily constituted and arbitrarily exercised. No serious person can believe that there ought to be a power greater than that of the state, a power that can, if it chooses, put itself beyond the reach of law. The conservative believes in the power of the state as necessary to the state's authority, and will seek to establish and enforce that power in the face of every influence that opposes it...”

It should be obvious that this definition is very different to that recognisable as modern Conservatism. To those who determine current Tory policy, the ‘minimal state’ is an axiomatic good – a concept easy to make popular because of the gross abuses of State authority by successive Labour governments and even some Conservative ones. It is, nevertheless, as Scruton implies, a Liberal idea.

Scruton is absolutely right in maintaining that there should be no power greater than that of the State – though, again, contemporary Conservatism repudiates this. The Thatcher revolution accelerated a tendency already existing in post-war British Conservatism: for Big Business to become, in effective terms, more powerful than Government. This was sanctified as a process desirable to protect the individual from ‘Big Government’, a term imported from America to depict government as some kind of uncontrollable leviathan which threatened the lives of the people in a manner more present in Orwellian fiction than in modern reality. The actual truth of the late 20th and early 21st centuries has been that the real leviathans are the multi-national corporations (including those of the mass media) and international finance, and that these threaten the people far more dangerously and destructively than any government. A powerful State – albeit one of a vastly different type and orientation than any known to present-day Britons – is in fact the only possible guarantor against these threats.

We might argue with Scruton over his reference to State power “arbitrarily constituted and arbitrarily exercised,” since all effective State power is, to a degree, arbitrary in both senses. No device has yet been found to constitute a power of the State that owes nothing at all to arbitrary procedures beyond the control of ordinary people, while the exercise of State power should not be condemned on the grounds that it is arbitrary but only on the grounds that it is bad. An exercise of power which, if arbitrary in method, nevertheless immensely strengthens the nation and benefits its people, should be welcomed rather than abhorred.

But these are criticisms of phrase and of emphasis. Essentially, Scruton recognises that strong State authority, far from being antipathetical to Conservatism, is a vital pillar of it. Only to the trendy modern Conservative whose mind has been filled with Liberal mumbo-jumbo is there a conflict between the two.

Contract of citizenship

Here is where we come back to the contract of citizenship referred to earlier. Without a strong State, that contract would require a level of human perfection so far never attained in this world. It would require that people behave towards each other in a manner completely lacking in any consideration for selfish interest and out of utter dedication to the overall social and national good. Only a tiny minority in the best of populations is so inclined, so that authority – an enlightened and benevolent authority, certainly, but authority nevertheless – is imperative for there to be a social and moral code that makes for the virtues necessary for a nation to survive in an inclement and challenging world environment.

Given such an authority, our social goals may not be that far removed from those enunciated by modern politicians: they should certainly include justice, compassion, prosperity, security – and, yes indeed, ‘care’! But they should also include other things, as I have stated earlier: things essential to our strength and survival as a nation. I spoke then of unity, discipline and cohesion. These desirable goals, as will be seen, involve the balance of rights and duties intrinsic to the older Conservatism but which the newer Conservatism scarcely ever mentions.

Importance of community

The other respect in which the older Conservatism differed radically from the older (and present) Liberalism was that Conservatives regarded the population essentially as a community – as distinct from merely an aggregate of so many individuals. It was a community strictly graded in terms of social status, certainly; and here one might argue that the gradations were excessively strict. But it was a community nevertheless. The fortunes of the country squire were seen to be bound up inextricably with those of his tenant farmers, and theirs in turn with their hired labourers. This at least was the basic ethic of Conservatism, as expressed in the term noblesse oblige; that some squires and some others of higher social rank would occasionally violate the principle does not invalidate it as a cornerstone of the Conservative faith. At the top of this pyramid of mutual obligations and loyalties was the nation itself: a collective racial, social and cultural entity – a community – which all served, from the highest to the lowest.

In the older Conservatism there was a simple yardstick by which human actions were judged: that which strengthened society, and thus the nation, was good and should be encouraged; that which weakened those things was bad and should be declared unacceptable. Here is where we might usefully look again at Mr. Duncan Smith's recent proclamations. He says that his party must care about the poor, the dispossessed and the vulnerable. All very fine! But a bit more clarification is needed. Which poor and why poor? Which dispossessed and why dispossessed? Which vulnerable and why vulnerable? Let's look at cases.

Genuinely in need

On the one hand there may be the case of the war widow whose husband lost his life in the service of his country. In Britain she is likely to be one of the worst provided for in Europe. She may well be scraping out a miserable existence in a leaky flat on the top floor of a high-rise inner-city housing block, badly neglected by a local authority which prioritises its expenditure in favour of ethnic minorities and sundry ‘gay’ projects. The lift may be almost permanently out of action and she is far too infirm to manage the stairs. In effect, she is imprisoned in her depressing abode and relies on friends or welfare helpers to get her shopping. And even if she could get about a bit better than that, the lift himself out of his twilight life and become a normal responsible citizen, able to pay his way in the world. On the contrary, the responsibility, in his eyes, lies with society to look after him. Why does he think this way? It is what he has been told in a left-wing pamphlet that he has read, and he eagerly agrees with it. He is a ‘victim’. None of his miserable plight is his own fault!

After he has settled with his local dealer, there is not enough left to pay for a decent regular meal, and he is going hungry. He

SPONGING OFF BRITAIN

This woman is one of the flood of (probably illegal) immigrants who have come here because they know this country to be a soft touch. Begging in the street – particularly with her child accompanying her – she very likely makes more in a day than many honest workers. The Tories should be demanding tough action against these economic migrants, but we've heard little from them on the subject; no doubt Duncan Smith fears that that would jeopardise his appeal to the 'bleeding-heart' constituency.

estate on which she lives is plagued by violent criminals while the law looks the other way, so that it simply isn't safe to venture beyond her doors at any time of day or night. She has to watch every penny of her meagre pension and may sometimes go short of essentials in the way of food and of warmth in the winter months.

Definitely not in need

Then there is another kind of case. This is the youngster who enjoyed all the benefits of a decent education, who went to university and there joined the drug ‘culture’. He has become an addict and spends most of his income, whether honesty acquired or not, on getting his ‘fix’. He has been to jail several times as a result of robberies carried out to pay for his habit. That means that getting a job is somewhat harder than it would have been had he had a clean record. He is not too bothered anyway; he does not regard himself under any obligation to do honest work, and he does not have the will or the character to looks a wreck. As for money for rent, no chance! He was chucked out of his lodgings a long time ago and now sleeps in shop doorways. In the winter, cold is a constant companion.

Now both these people might correctly be described as ‘poor’, ‘dispossessed’ and ‘vulnerable’, but to put them in the same category and talk of our social ‘obligation’ to help them equally is sheer insanity. Yet party politicians feel bound to do just that – for the very pragmatic reason that each has a vote, and the votes of one and the other are worth just the same!

Of course, even the likes of Iain Duncan Smith, if put on the spot, would not pretend that the claims of our elderly war widow and our criminal junkie are equally deserving; but the language in which Mr. Duncan Smith speaks when he croons on about the poor, the dispossessed and the vulnerable sends out this very signal: it tells us that the Tory leader is on the hunt for crosses on a ballot paper, and can think of nothing better than to pose as everybody's sugar daddy.

I would venture the view that today, for every case involving people like our war widow, there are a hundred involving those like our junkie – to whom I would add legions of so-called 'asylum-seekers' who have got into the country by one device or another and are milking our welfare system dry by way of hard-luck stories which touch the consciences of the bleeding hearts, while providing opportunities to the unscrupulous political agitator and careerist who feeds on 'problems' and sees the condition of such people as a heaven-sent 'problem' providing him with a slogan and perhaps a job. Britain in modern times has become a gigantic human refuse yard demanding maintenance bills which leave us tragically short of the means to help those in genuine need where such cases arise. The sorting out of the deserving minority from the useless and parasitic majority seems completely beyond the capacity of our modern political class, who use the buzzwords 'care' and 'compassion' solely as ammunition in the political armoury and never as expressions of real social concern.

Lack of real government

We have this situation today because, in truth, we do not have government. Oh yes, we have lots of men and women going through the motions of government: debating and voting in parliament and in the council chambers, shuffling papers and issuing reports, attending meetings of committees, making statements to the press, forming focus groups, every so often (such as at election times) going around speaking to constituents and ascertaining their desires. But these things do not amount to government. Government means exercising State authority. It means leading. It means getting things done.

Conservatives used to understand this, and that is what set them apart from Liberals, whose essential skills lay in the expression of pretty sentiments. And Conservatives used to understand something more: they understood that with government there comes responsibility. If a great social or economic sore exists within the national body, it is the responsibility of government to do something about it. Conservatives recognised that, as President Truman said in a notice behind his office desk, "The buck stops here!"

Modern Conservatives take the Liberal view that it is not the responsibility of government to take a lead in such matters. They hide behind the fatuous concept that the State is not there to solve problems but to leave individuals to solve them themselves – a concept that amounts to no more than a cop-out from the duty of leadership, expressed in the equally fatuous aphorism that "a government governs best which governs least."

This has many ghastly symptoms. One of them is that government leaves virtually all great economic issues to be decided by 'The Market'. It means that if a great industry, such as coal mining, shipbuilding or motor manufacturing, on which a whole community relies for its livelihood, goes bust as a result of the working of 'market forces', nothing should be done to rescue it, and hundreds of thousands, if necessary, should go on the dole in order to keep faith with this rule. As another symptom, 'market forces' should be allowed to determine the survival of such a vital cultural institution as the British film industry – with the result that no such industry as we used to know it any longer exists, and the cinema-going and TV-viewing public are fed an almost non-stop diet of trashy movies from the United States which leaves our young people culturally Americanised (or, as some would claim, Judaised) and with little sense of their own identity or traditions.

If we find, as we are presently finding, that an alarming proportion of our population is physically out of shape and lacking the energy either for productive work or vigorous sport and leisure, the received wisdom with Conservatives – today even more than with Labourites – is that this is all a matter for individuals to sort out for themselves and that no firm State initiatives should be taken to rectify the situation. The result is that Britain is dangerously unfit for the tasks of peace or war – a condition for which future generations may come to curse us.

No action, only drift

These are all areas which, along with many others, are appropriate ones for State action. Yet there is no action, and everything is allowed to drift. The drift has become an icon of the present-day Conservative faith. That terrible dragon, the State, must be kept out of people's lives, and a population must be left to fall into decadence – if it so desires!

Margaret Thatcher, whether apocryphally or not, was once reported as saying: "There's no such thing as society; there is only the individual." Though Tories have been trying ever since to distance their party from these words, Tory policy continues largely to echo them. Tories would be much better advised to take heed of the message of a much older spokesman of theirs, Edmund Burke, that...

"Society... is to be looked upon with... reverence, because it is not a partnership in things subservient only to the gross animal existence of a temporary and perishable nature. It is a partnership in all science, a partnership in all art, a partnership in every virtue, and in all perfection. As the ends of such a partnership cannot be obtained in many generations, it becomes a partnership not only between those who are living and those who are dead, but between those who are living and those who are dead, and those who are to be born."

That, interestingly enough, encapsulates the nationalist faith. Our nation is an eternal spring, to be nourished by the generation of today just as it was by past generations – and for the sake of generations to come. Before the 'right' of enjoying the spring's fruits, there comes the duty to defend it, nurture it and pass it on. This imposes upon us responsibilities of citizenship wholly alien to the Liberal mind, with its obsession with 'individual freedom' and its injunction to 'eat, drink and enjoy'. It imposes upon us the duty to be fit and strong, to practise the social disciplines and to think and work as a team – to link our individual destinies with the destiny of our race. It requires that our people be a community, bound together in the service of something greater than themselves, with goals higher than mere individual greed.

Conservatives once believed in such things. Some still do today, but their party does so no longer. And it is not sufficient anyway just to believe; belief must be accompanied by the preparedness to act – and when necessary to fight.

In this article I have examined those things that Conservatives and nationalists have in common. It is in this final imperative that there exists the greatest difference.

The new black art

LITERALLY hundreds of major British companies and public organisations, dealing in a wide range of consumer durables and financial and advisory services, now use ethnic minorities exclusively in their adverts in the national press. This is largely due to the growing (and malignant) influence exerted by government agencies and promotional and multi-media services, which are severely limiting the pictorial imagery of Britain available for media circulation, largely for political reasons.

Together, as part of a compact and tightly-knit commerce/culture/media New Élite, referred to in last month's issue, they have jointly decided to present a new image of Britain to itself and to the world. These activists probably total no more than 300 press picture editors, advertising lay-out men and government publicists. Their ultimate aim is to brainwash the British public into accepting, as a fait accompli, the fact that Britain is now truly a 'multi-cultural society'.

The picture editors of the national dailies no longer see themselves as part of news or editorial teams, but as promotional/marketing types. They now use mainly ethnic minorities in any features concerning children, careers or education, and they do this in conjunction with the advertising élites (for example, the Sunday Times recently used a 'Back to School' feature in conjunction with the Tesco supermarket chain, showing only black children).

However, there are other complex factors at work. Firstly, any resistance to this over-representation of non-white racial groups is hamstrung by the fact that many publicity pictures on various subjects (like education) are available from photo agencies (like Photofusion, one of several). These agencies, and other independent charitable or welfare groups and other pressure groups dealing with 'caring' subjects, have photo libraries that are overly stocked with pictures of ethnic minorities.

Further, the potential to provide more of an ethnic balance is stealthily undermined by government agencies or ministries, dealing with the same 'sensitive' issues, which supply the media with mainly pictures of minorities. So journalists needing a generic photo to illustrate a subject have to use what they are given. In fact, the government takes the lead in this regard, and ensures the lead is followed. Official publications, such as booklets and promotional leaflets, are chock-full of images of black people. In virtually every case they are shown not as minorities but as if they were part of the mainstream population, even as company bosses. The Inland Revenue, in a broadsheet advert, showed a black man, with the heading reading: "My staff said I should..."

ANTONY MILNE shows how the advertising industry is being used for the spread of multi- racialist propaganda

As has been pointed out before, only half the ethnic minorities living in this country (who total some 8 per cent) have full British passports. If one assumes that the two largest diasporas, those who are descended from the Indian sub-continent and those of African or Afro-Caribbean origin, each separately form half of the 8 per cent total, this means that a black man, whether seen in the street or in a press advert, represents only two per cent of the total number of British citizens. Hence some 98 per cent of the population are obliged to see, not their own image reflected in British adverts, but people who are totally unlike themselves in appearance and in nationality. It is rather as if the Japanese (or indeed the Africans in Africa) showed huge numbers of white European nationals in their adverts.

Readers of these adverts would have every right to ask: "What is the advertiser trying to say? Is he advertising goods or services, or does he have some other message?"

One obvious conclusion is that advertisers are doing their bit to 'combat racism'. This can only be meant as a joke. Their main objective is not to make religious or political statements, nor to appear 'compassionate', but to sell things. The power-élites of the multi-national corporations never do anything out of altruism. They are much more likely to be in the rip-off business than the compassion business. They have one aim in life: to maximise their profits and enhance their corporate global power.

CONSUMER POPULATION IDEAL

At a stretch, it might be thought that the promotion of 'multi-culturalism' perhaps suits those forced to trade in a forthcoming new borderless world order. The New Élites are certainly not averse to overseeing the breakdown of the cohesiveness of nation-states, and they help this along by promoting the fragmentation of societies into mere atomised consumers without allegiance to any race or nation.

One can also understand how the multi-nationals feel the need to promote, as an aspirational idea, a thoroughly racially mixed Britain. Magnet, the large interior furnishings company, as well as Furnitureland and Wickes, the home improvement centres, show, as a matter of routine, young black men actually living in the homes of white British people, even sharing kitchens with them. Wickes uses a bucket-shop advertising outfit in Manchester with the unlikely name of BDHTBWA, probably a corruption of some African name.

However the big corporations are not so foolish as to not see the dangers in all this. It is a bit risky getting involved in complex issues of race and nationality to the extent that it might obscure any commercial message. If one sees a giant face of black man in a broadsheet advert, with only the small print of the text hinting at the product being sold (which has nothing to do with blackness), this looks like a gross failure of commercial judgement.

The most obvious danger is that the service being offered is seen as being for the exclusive benefit of the tiny racial group being shown. The opposite paradoxical risk is that many Blacks and Asians do not have the high purchasing power or banking credentials to take advantage of the commercial services being offered, so the advertisers are in danger of shooting themselves in the foot twice over. For example, Lloyds TSB uses the solitary picture of a black man's face in its national press adverts. The caption reads: "I needed far more than money when I started up in business." This implies that black people are up-and-coming business types, whereas Blacks in reality are the least business-minded people in the country (the Chinese and Asians make far better role models).

ASIAN BUSINESSES

Even putting Asians in adverts is not a good promotional idea. Most successful Asian businessmen in Britain are outside the main professional and commercial networks, and they prefer it that way. They do not contribute to the wealth of the British economy as a whole, but circulate their earnings and profits amongst the Asian communities. Sarindar Singh Sahota,

'Chair' of the Asian Business Forum, has pleaded in The Times for "more Asian politicians and Asian-owned media for us to get recognition and to have a fuller consideration in decisions that affect us."

Are, therefore, the multi-nationals prepared to lose money in the short run for ultimate longer-term gains on the assumption that the ethnic communities in Britain are bound to grow and national borders are indeed coming down everywhere?

Not entirely. One reason for the growth in multi-cultural adverts lies in the changing nature of the advertising profession itself. Agencies have not only dwindled in size (the largest today employs only 310 people) but do a lot less than they used to. The large corporations are part of what are known as 'media-buying specialists'. They used to have some say over the creative input into adverts, because advertising was embodied in much bigger promotional set-ups. Most of the creative content is now handled by the smaller bucket-shop advertisers employing just a handful of left-liberal arts college-educated youngsters who work to their own fun-loving cosmopolitan agenda. When a company employs one of these advertisers, and is presented with a black advert, political correctness (and probably fear) inhibits the media buyer from asking for white people to appear in the advert.

Some corporate media buyers are aware of this danger, and it has not all been plain sailing. For example, the Lloyds TSB advert was created by two young ear-ring-studded white men in the back office of Interfocus of South Kensington, who clearly thought that Lloyds should do its bit for the good of community relations, rather than worry about how much business they could drum up.

Halifax Building Society has also been lumbered with a nationally promoted half-page advert showing a bald-headed young black guy, by himself, advertising banking facilities. Recently, to fit in with its slogan 'Always giving you extra', it doubled the image by showing the same black man in the advert, twice over. This story board was one of several designed by Delaney, Lund, Knox and Warren. The ethnic advert was chosen, but only after some rancorous squabbling had taken place and the marketing board of Halifax was presented with a take-it-or-leave-it choice by someone pulling rank.

EMBARRASSED TO REFUSE

Many adverts are also done by 'in-house marketing groups', but again the company directors feel too embarrassed to turn down a fully black advert. For example, DFS, describing itself as 'Britain's Leading Upholstery Specialists', showed a full-page ad in South London newspapers with a solitary black man sitting on a sale-price sofa. This advert was designed 'in-house' by someone called Andrew Trofimowicz.

Antler Homes, showing colour pictures of stately country houses, many clearly costing up to half a million, illustrated their adverts with a main picture showing that the typical potential customer was clearly not an Anglo-Celt, implying that all these lovely British homes are up for grabs for any foreign national who wants them.

This advert was designed by advertisers Aylesworth Fleming.

The desperation of these young advertisers in showing black people to be highly qualified, top-rank professional types, is reflected in the pages of New Scientist, edited by the politically correct Jeremy Webb. Webb, along with his photo editors Adam Cox and Wendy Stokes, now uses only black people to illustrate any science story about human activity. Cox gave approval in his journal to an advert by the

TYPICAL MORTGAGEE?

This advert by the Halifax Building Society appeared recently in The Times.

Medical Devices Agency, specialising in 'safeguarding public health', which was devised by Rileys of Bristol. But it showed only coloured people as its prospective employees.

Another science-based company, Lab Support UK, also showed exclusively one black woman who was "going places with her career." This advert was designed by 'Thirtythree Ltd.' of London. Eli Lilley and Co, of Basingstoke, a major pharmaceutical manufacturer, had an in-house advert done by someone called David Rees. The advert at the top read: 'Innovation has a face...' Out of ten faces shown under his heading Rees showed only two that were clearly European.

The dramatic change in the demeanour of New Scientist, which used to be a first-rate science journal, shows how tiny groups of people, even solitary individuals, have enormous cultural power in shaping attitudes and values in Britain. Another example of the go-it-alone multi-culturalist is reflected in the pre-budget report from HM Treasury, issued in November 2001, which showed a silhouette of the British Isles over which was superimposed the picture of a mixed-race family. This, again, was designed in some back room by one unprepossessing little scruff desperate to earn his PC credentials by the name of David Clarke, the so-called 'Head of the Treasury Publishing Unit'.

Much of this over-representation is a subtle form of racism itself. It is clearly disrespectful of ethnic minorities. Dressing Asians in western garb and showing them obsessively participating in consumerist lifestyles does them no cultural favours. For example, Abbey National, on TV and in the press, advertised a joyful Asian wearing football colours, who had just bought a house overlooking a major league football ground. Asians may do a lot of things the British do, but very few of them attend football matches, least of all wear football teams' colours!

Ethnic minorities are clearly on the receiving end of pathological feelings of white guilt from inadequate people who have misread history and think that the White Man is responsible for much black suffering. Though disadvantaged people cannot suddenly be turned into professionals and scientists overnight without the necessary qualifications, they can, through positive discrimination, and to boost their egos, be given easy media jobs like being television presenters, or appear in stylish up-market adverts. It's about time the ethnic minorities began to realise that they are being taken for a ride.

THE SILENT SLAUGHTER

Though westerners hear about Israeli aggression in the Middle East, the worst excesses are almost always covered up. IAN BUCKLEY reports

AS I write these words, the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem – one of the holiest shrines in what used to be called Christendom – is under siege by tanks and troops, the entire area having been sealed off and placed under Israeli military control. A day earlier, the cocky conscripts of the Israel Defence Forces shot down an Italian priest. Perhaps they were fair and shouted out: "Drop that chalice" first though!

In an earlier brutal excursion into Bethlehem on March 14th, an Israeli tank took a pot shot at the Holy Family Church, damaging statues and terrifying nuns and women patients in an adjoining church hospital.

The official media's routine censorship means that little news of these disgraceful events filters through to the British public – events rightly termed by Ian Gilmour as "An affront to civilisation."

But the compliant staff of the liberal 'mainstream' media need not worry, since our church leaders from the Arch Hypocrite of Canterbury¹ downwards are so cowed and neutered that they would make no protest in any case. Apparently, even the God squad are now on the side of the big battalions! So the silent slaughter of the Palestinians is allowed to continue.

By the way, the percentage of Christians in the Holy Land of their faith has now dropped to just two per cent, an example of 'religious cleansing' surely unequalled since the days when 'The Wolf of the Kremlin', Lazar Kaganovich, was going about dynamiting churches and cathedrals in the USSR.

Nor are foreign clergy the only victims of the arrogant Israelis; Italian news photographer Raffaele Ciriello has been deliberately gunned down – just for doing his job too well.

Meanwhile, President George W. Bush and his quaky-voiced little acolyte Blair discuss an attack on the dangerous rogue nation of ... Iraq! After years of sanctions and bombing, one wonders exactly what sort of threat Iraq poses in comparison to the aggressive and well-armed state of Israel.

Senseless policy

Motorists might like to reflect that, moral considerations apart, the senseless antagonising of the Arab countries carried on by this gruesome twosome disposal of the Jewish lobbies in Britain and the USA, then we might have heard about the Israeli paper Novosti, popular with incomers from Russia, which published an editorial calling for the castration of Palestinians. Though the editor of the paper was admittedly reprimanded, not one adverse comment was received from readers.

But as no such mass media access exists, there has not been a great deal of publicity either about the common and revolting practice of removing organs from the Palestinian youths shot dead by the Israeli Army for sale on the empties their wallets through higher petrol prices.

'Tolerance and diversity' sadly missing in Jenin camp. Not many readers of the western press saw this picture.

If only the Palestinians had the well-oiled propaganda machines at the lucrative medical market. The fanatics of the Temple Faithful believe that the Palestinians will shortly vanish like 'dust before the wind'.

Likewise, there were no headlines over the death of 10-year-old Maria Abu Siriya, shot by an Israeli Army sniper as she innocently played in her living room while Israeli tanks, artillery and gunships invaded Jenin. Nor do we hear much about the elderly Palestinian women who have their doors battered down while the orders are barked: "Leave your home – the bulldozers are outside!"

One wonders if an Arab Spielberg will soon be making moving, tear-jerking films about these very real events, or if these details will go down in the textbooks of the National Curriculum, to be spoon-fed to children. Will Maria Abu Siriya have plays or books written about her, and her house, like that of Anne Frank, become a pilgrimage site half a century hence? Perhaps not!

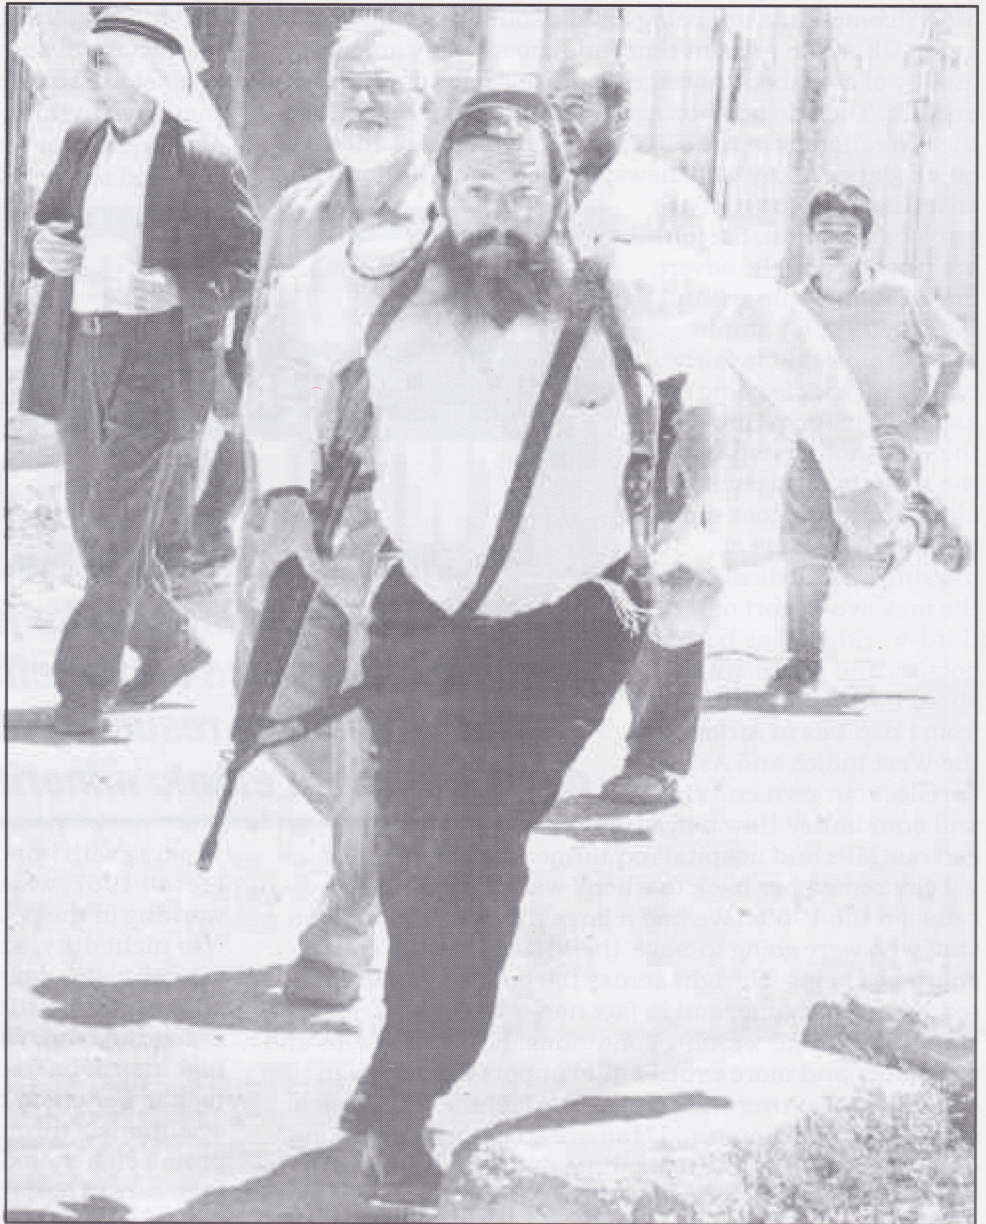

Not 'anti-Semitism'

Some outside our movement might suggest that this article is merely an expression of 'anti-Semitism'. It is, in fact, nothing of the kind, for in all of my writings I have been careful to distinguish between ordinary law-abiding Jews and the NWO power-addicts and money thugs of every race – including a large number of our own Anglo-Celtic folk. Additionally, if you want to understand the nature of the Beast, the works of Benjamin Freedman, Arthur Koestler and Noam Chomsky – all Jewish – are as good a place to start as any.

Another dissident, Israel Shamir (not to be confused with former Israeli premier Yitzhak), thinks that the Israeli treatment of the Palestinians is far harsher than that meted out to his own people by the Germans in 1938. This view had been confirmed by the new book Hitler's Jewish Army, by Bryan Mark Rigg. Professor Rigg details the stories of some of the thousands of part- and full-Jews who served in the armies of the Third Reich. Typical was the case of the Wehrmacht captain who continued to practise Judaism while on active service!

Let us remember, when the squealing about Arab 'terrorism' begins, that the entire state of Israel was founded on terrorism – against British troops, to whom the perpetrators should really have been profoundly grateful, according to their own national *mythos*².

lition teams, but we should remember that extreme hatred and violence always eventually destroy the perpetrator. Even by General Sharon's own terms of ruthless machtpolitik such a policy is flawed, since it depends almost entirely on the flow of money and war materiel provided by the compliant legislature of the United States. It is doubtful if this state of affairs will continue for very much longer.

Americans waking up?

For many Americans – far too many for the comfort of the Israeli lobby – are beginning to grasp the obvious conclusion that had the US followed its own national interests, instead of those of Israel, the 3,000 or more of its civilians killed in the September 11th attacks would still be alive today.

What would be the chances of obtaining hundreds of free tanks, missiles and attack helicopters from an America run by someone like Pat Buchanan, still less someone like William Pierce? Not too great, I would venture!

The world is changing fast, and the wheels of history are moving again. Let us say to our discredited and pathetic 'leaders': "No wars for the morally (and financially) bankrupt bandit state in the Middle East! Let's put our own people first, and solve our numerous problems that you've lumbered us with!"

¹ Note to offended Anglican readers: The Arch Hypocrite definitely richly deserves this title since he has made no adverse comment whatever about the earlier gunning down of a choirboy in Manger Square.

² Every nation is entitled to a mythos, but it's utterly wrong to impose it on everyone else, as has been attempted with 'Holocaust Day'.

MANY complaints are being aired about the Health Service in the UK at the present time, and mostly they are about quality of care, bed shortages and shortages of nurses and doctors. There is no shortage of administrative staff, and the bureaucracy of the service is a very heavy burden. A quick glance at my local newspaper in Norfolk shows an advertisement for staff at our local hospital. Six jobs are displayed in the advert, one detailing 'Nurses' and the other five for admin staff. I think that is fairly typical of what is going on and going wrong. However, there is another aspect of the NHS that is a cause for alarm, and this goes right to the cutting edge of nursing and medical care: the massive import of third-world staff as both doctors and nurses. Why should we expect staff from hospitals in Africa, the West Indies and Asia to reflect our own culture and standards? How naïve can our MPs and hospital recruitment facilities get?

I can remember back to when I was in training as a nurse in the 1960s. We had a large influx of West Indian staff who were going to 'save' the NHS due to the staff shortages being felt right across the board. The actual redress at that time, and in fact now, should be to improve staff salaries and training conditions. However, it was and is cheaper and more expedient to import these foreign staff and paper over the cracks. The fact that the clinical standards of the imported staff are sometimes appalling does not come into the reckoning, and it is the patients who suffer in both the short and long term.

Difficulties in working together

Another factor is that our own home-trained staff are forced to work with these imports, and that makes the job less and less attractive as the alien behaviour and attitudes of some of the new staff make them extremely difficult to work with. I have, as a nurse, experienced all these things personally. So have many of my friends, who then find that job satisfaction diminishes, and the effort of working with colleagues who exhibit such low standards of care and professionalism becomes worrying, if not frightening. In the case of a nurse highly trained in the UK system and of good intelligence, working with a third-world doctor can sometimes be horrific – as one sees all one's expectations of clinical expertise and patient care going straight out the window; and one is left translating to the patient or trying to pretend that the dreadful examination or treatment meted out is normal and to be expected.

Most nurses are muted concerning this situation. If they say anything they may be considered 'racist' if the staff is black or Asian. They could lose their jobs, be reported to the UKCC and get a bad reference. It's easier to say nothing than to rock the boat, and so the state of worsening care and standards escalates. Finally, we have the situation that we have now: low standards, low clinical expertise, little innovative research and chronic staff shortages. An NHS that once boasted excellence and a reputation envied throughout the world is in tatters. Today it warrants the description of 'third world and third rate'.

Horrific experiences

My own experiences working with imported third-world staff are pretty horrific. I recall 1967, when as a second-year student nurse I was working in the post-natal ward of a London hospital. It was night duty, and three of us were in the ward: a first-year student, a black Jamaican midwife and myself. I was entrusted with the care of a lady who had an emergency caesarian, and was considered to carry a post-operative high risk of haemorrhage. Every quarter of an hour I was to take her blood pressure and pulse, and I did this conscientiously throughout the night and all was well. I had promised her anxious husband and parents that I would take care of her; their worried faces were etched into my memory. At about 3 a.m. it was time for my meal break, so I passed the information to the midwife that the observations were fine, and would need doing a quarter of an hour after I left the ward. On my return an hour later, I went straight to the patient and checked her pulse. It was rapid and thready. An inspection of the bed revealed a large amount of blood; my patient was bleeding badly. A glance at the observation chart showed that none had been taken in my absence. The patient was rushed back to theatre and given a trans-fusion. Thank God, her life was saved.

Without discovery, the patient would have continued bleeding, slipped into a coma and died. After all the drama, I checked the patient's notes. All the observations were now filled in; the qualified but idle West Indian nurse knew how to cover her back!

Once I was working on a cancer ward in a major London hospital. We were very short-staffed: just two student nurses, then a qualified black Agency

THIRD WORLD AND THIRD RATE

VIVIENNE PARKER speaks from personal experience on the effects on NHS standards resulting from dependence on ethnic minority staff

British hospitals once ran perfectly well with all-white staff, as in this picture. Standards would vastly improve if we returned to that practice.

SRN arrived to take over the ward. She gave out the drugs whilst we two settled down the patients, giving out washes and night care. Lights were turned off and all was quiet. The Agency nurse disappeared. I looked all over for her but soon became too busy with patients to look any further.

One patient was incontinent, and fresh linen was needed. In the linen cupboard, soundly slumbering on a chair, was the agency nurse! She spent the whole night sleeping! Several of my friends had the same experience with imported nurses.

Later, more dealings with overseas staff were experienced. I had the horrific delivery of my son in Peterborough where the doctor involved was an Arab and was callous and rude to an unbelievable degree. I felt more like I had been butchered than given birth. The neglect and low obstetric standards compared to one's training instruction were shocking.

Neglect

Recently I was in a private hospital in London. Most of the Nursing staff were from such places as the Gambia, Nigeria and the West Indies. I was paying £380 a day for my room and nursing, and mostly never saw a nurse all day. I was on a drip (i.v. line), and whenever it needed changing I rang my bell to advise the nurse. However, even with this the drip was allowed to run through, and so by the time (usually at least an hour later) the nurse brought the new feeder bag my i.v. line had stopped working. This was no problem to the nurse. She grabbed hold of the i.v. line and pulled it like a piece of elastic. The fact that this was extremely painful to me was of no consequence, but that sort of attitude was normal. My bed was not made until 7 p.m. at night or later, when I finally rang the bell. This would result in a lot of banging and crashing around the room, as this sort of effort was clearly resented. These overseas nurses did not know how to raise a drip pole or work the blood-pressure machine, and frequently did not bring in ordered drugs. The low standards were really frightening, but no one seemed to care. I was in the ward for a week, and it was the most unpleasant and depressing experience. When I left the hospital I detailed my complaints to the Nursing Director, mainly saying that the neglect and indifference of the nurses to patients needs was a recipe for disaster. She sent me a pathetic reply, and clearly as long as her hospital could employ nurses on the cheap all was well! I would never go back to that hospital again under any circumstances – and perhaps you thought private hospitals were better!

A visit to a local hospital with my demented father-in-law was ghastly. We waited over an hour and a half beyond the appointment time, and then got to see an Asian doctor. He shouted at my father, waving an x-ray up and down. His manner was crude and insulting: no respect or care whatsoever for his patient. There was no apology for his lateness, and he told us nothing of use or interest. I really wondered why we had bothered to go and why the hospital was forced to employ such crude, ill-mannered and incompetent staff. The man's English was so poor we could hardly understand a word he said.

People wonder why we are so short of our own trained staff. With hospitals running their own budgets and trusts, one way they save lots of cash (which will of course pay for more admin staff and their perks) is by cutting down on training – and this applies to doctors and nurses alike. My niece trained as a doctor in 1991, and told me that one third of her course had been booted out of training purely to save money. These were all dedicated young people who had the A-levels to commence medical school. At the same time, many health trusts were selling off nurses' homes and accommodation, and drastically cutting nurse training. They saved money at the time, but we are paying very dearly for their short-sightedness now.

Decisions by lay people

Administrative decisions about staffing and quality of staff are being dealt with by lay persons: non-doctors and non-nurses. They simply do not have the skills to understand high standards and low standards. They seem to think that all nurses and all doctors are the same. Maybe they will wake up one day and realise that the reason why standards are so good in France and Germany is because the hospitals in these countries are mainly staffed by their own nationals and not imported third-world personnel.

There are pockets of excellence in the NHS; no prizes for guessing who the staff are! However, until graduate doctors and nurses are paid a proper market rate for the job and training is made easier, things will not improve.

My own daughter is currently training to be a doctor in London. This is her first year, and it has cost us a huge amount of money. On top of her housing, utilities, food and clothes, there are specialist books, and £1,075 tuition fees to the Government. We can afford to support her, but another would-be medic without well-off parents would need to borrow about £12,000 per annum at least to stay the three-year course. Quite a burden for a newly qualified doc, so who can blame them for leaving the NHS and finding lucrative work wherever?

The problems in the NHS are not simple, but we are not going to resolve them by importing more and more third-world staff. I wonder if the NHS bureaucrats ever ask themselves why we do not get American, French and German doctors hot-footing it to the UK to work, and why only those from Asia and Africa find it so attractive? These are questions they do not want to face, but are happy for poor-quality, callous, unskilled, uncaring third-world staff to be foisted onto a public who are increasingly confused and despairing about the lousy care at their local hospitals, and the shortage of beds and sympathy. There will be no improvement until we ensure that we are training adequate numbers of our own nationals, and rate quality of personnel over a quick, cheap fix.

Our schools and universities produce many fine students who will make excellent doctors and nurses. They need support and help to complete their training, and then expect competitive salaries when they qualify. If a good training programme is put in practice, in a few years we will have ample staff to serve the NHS and make the service a proud institution and attractive work place. Failure to do this will continue to make us, our NHS and reputation in medical care the sick man of Europe – a lesson on what to avoid and how not to run a health service.

I would like to see the NHS a showplace for British enterprise and expertise: a leader in research and advanced medical practice. This could happen with the right planning and use of our own innovative, highly intelligent indigenous people. We have a great deal to be proud of in being British, as all patriots know, so let's make the NHS something special – somewhere attractive to work, with a reputation for excellence.

THE 11th of this month (February 2002. Ed.) will mark the beginning of the sixth month of our war against terrorism. We haven't yet got Osama bin Laden; we don't even know where he is or if he's dead or alive. But in the search we have killed thousands of poor civilian Afghans, bombed their cities and infrastructure into rubble, and participated in the installation of a militaristic régime more friendly to Marxism than to the West.

And to accomplish this, with little more than token opposition, we've allowed our 'free-world' governments to abrogate many of our rights and freedoms inherent in our heritage. So the real costs of our first five months of 'war' against terrorism have been heavy, not even including the financial costs now involved.

Against this, we need to examine the positive, constructive results of our efforts, and where we stand today in this battle. But this requires more background information and insight into this 'war on terrorism' we've become embroiled in. And the purpose of this article is to provide at least some views, insights and perspectives largely either missed or suppressed by our media and political powers.

A disquieting view of Sept. 11th

Last November 7th, we received an e-mail from a West Coast contact which included a report captioned 'The Enemy Is Inside the Gates', by US Army Colonel (Retired) Donn de Grand Pré. Following are excerpts:-

"A dedicated group of experienced civilian and military pilots, including combat fighter pilots and commercial airline captains, just finished a marathon 72 hours of non-stop briefings and debate over the current crisis evolving from the use of commercial aircraft as cruise missiles against the World Trade Centre and the Pentagon on 11 September.

"The so-called terrorist attack was in fact a superbly executed military operation against the United States, requiring the utmost professional military skill in command, communications and control. It was flawless in timing, in the choice of selected aircraft to be used as guided missiles, and in the co-ordinated delivery of those missiles to their pre-selected targets.

"As a tactical military exercise against two significant targets (world financial centre and the citadel of world strategic military planning), the attack, from a psychological impact on the American public, equalled the Japanese 'surprise' attack on Pearl Harbour 7 Dec. 1941.

"The overriding question: if we are at war, who is the enemy?

"The group determined that the enemy is within the gates, that he has infiltrated into the highest policy-making positions at the Federal level, and has absolute control, not only of the purse strings, but of the troop build-up and deployment of our military forces, including active, reserve and National Guard units.

"The 9-11 activity and horrific destruction of US property and lives was intentionally meant to trigger a psychological and patriotic reaction on the part of the US citizens, which is paving the way for 'combined UN activity' (using the fig leaf of NATO) for striking key targets in both the Middle East/South Asia and the Balkans. The goal continues to be ultimate destruction of all national sovereignty and establishment of a global government.

Who is the enemy?

"Following is a summary of the near-unanimous views of the assembled military and civilian pilots concerning certain critical factors relating to the WTC/Pentagon hit of 9-11:

- "Troubling questions arose about the alleged pilot-hijackers of the four aircraft, who were supposedly trained on Cessna aircraft over the past year at fields in Florida and Oklahoma. One General officer remarked: 'I seriously question whether these novices could have located a target dead-on 200 miles removed from take-off point... - much less controlled the flight and mastered the intricacies of 11.FR (instrument flight rules) - and all accomplished in 45 minutes.'

- "The extremely skilful manoeuvring of the three aircraft at near Mach speeds, each unerringly hitting their targets, was superb. As one Air Force officer - a veteran of over 100 sorties over North Vietnam - explained, 'Those birds (commercial airliners) either had a crack fighter pilot in the left seat, or they were being manoeuvred by remote control.'

- "Another pilot warned that 'we had better consider whether electro-magnetic pulse or radio frequency

Scene of devastation after the World Trade Centre attack. Do the official explanations of what happened square with the facts?

weapons were used from a command and control platform hovering over the Eastern Seaboard... I'm talkin' AWACS.'

- "Another comment: 'If there were an AWACS on station over the targeted area, did it have a Global Hawk capability? I mean, could it convert the commercial jets to robotic flying missiles?'

- "A hotly debated question: Who would be in command of such an Airborne Warning and Control System (AWACS)? Were they Chinese - Russians - Saudis - Israelis - NATO? All of these countries possess AWACS-type aircraft. All (except the Saudis) have the capability to utilize electro-magnetic pulsing (EMP) to knock out on-board flight controls and communications of targeted air-craft, and then, to fly them by remote control.

- "One of the Air Force officers explained that we had already flown a robot plane the size of a Boeing 737 across the Pacific to Australia - unmanned - from Edwards AF 13 in California to a successful landing on an Aussie base in South Australia. It flies along a pre-programmed flight path, but is 'monitored' (controlled remotely) by a pilot from an outside station.

"He explained that the London Economist (20 Sept. 2001) published comments from the former CEO of British Airways, Robert Ayling, who stated that an aircraft could be commandeered from the ground or air and controlled remotely in the event of a hijack.

Commercial jets as guided missiles

"An AP story, dateline Brussels - 7 Oct. 01 - 'At Washington's request, NATO will soon deploy surveillance aircraft for anti-terrorist operations in the United States in response to the attacks on New York and Washington, NATO officials said Sunday, an unprecedented use of foreign military forces to defend the U.S. homeland.'

"The assembled group of pilots debated why we would ask for foreign forces to fly AWACS over our sovereign territory when we have a fleet of 33 of them, of which 28 are stationed in Oklahoma. The debate also centered on whether such NATO surveillance aircraft were already here prior to 11 September.

"Could one of them have commandeered the four airliners?

"There seems to be wide discrepancies between what the Federal government is proclaiming - and their media moguls reporting - as opposed to the calm and reasoned and rational views of those men who fly the planes and defend the nation against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

"This writer has been a general aviation pilot since 1946. I have flown a variety of single-engine prop aircraft since, and installed an FAA-approved airstrip here on my farm in 1980. Two local pilots periodically joined me for short hops; one a Madison County lawyer, a graduate of the Air Force Academy, who flew for the Air Force before coming home to practice law.

"The other, Kent Hill, who lives with his wife, Carol, on a farm close to mine, is an American Airlines captain assigned to the European route. He was a lifelong friend of 'Chic' Burlingame. They were graduates of the Naval Academy and flew F-4 Phantoms in Vietnam. Both left the Navy 28 years ago and joined American Airlines. Both planned to retire in 2002. Chic was the captain of AA flight 77, a Boeing 757, which departed Washington Dulles for Los Angeles at 8:10 a.m. on 11 September, with 58 passengers and a crew of 6. Flight 77 crashed into the Pentagon at 9:41 a.m. (sic: 8:41 a.m.?).

" 'We were totally trained on the old type of hijack,' Capt. Hill said, 'where you treat the hijacker cordially, punch a 4-digit code into your transponder to alert ground control you're being hijacked, and then get him where he wants to go, set the plane safely on the ground and let them deal with it on the ground. However, this is a totally new situation... Not one of the planes alerted ground control that they were being hijacked.' How come?

" 'The fact is, all the transponders were turned off on the doomed flights virtually at the same time.' Look at their departure times - two from Logan (Boston), one from Newark, another from Dulles (Washington DC) - all between 8 a.m. and 8.15.

" 'Shortly after climb-out to flight level, their transponders are de-activated... (they are no longer a blip on the radar screens). This is something that really needs to be looked into. The only reason we turn them off is so they don't interfere with ground systems when we land...'

"Although there is much talk among the various flight crews, Hill says they are not privy to any of the investigations into the events of 11 September. 'We're in the dark - very much so... They're playing it pretty tight to the vest.'

"He is convinced none of the pilots had control of their aircraft when they were flown into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The question then becomes, who was really in control?

" 'Even if I had a gun at my head, I'd never fly a plane into a building. I'd try to put it in anywhere - a field or river - and I'd be scaring the hell out of them (the hijackers) by flying upside down first,' Hill said.

"In fact, the pilot has the best weapon in his hand when threatened with imminent death by a hijacker, namely the airplane.

"Another airline pilot stated: 'On hearing a major scuffle in the cabin, the pilot should have inverted the aircraft and the hijackers end up with broken necks.'

"That none of the four pilots executed such a manoeuvre points toward the fact that none of them had control of their aircraft, but had been overridden by an outside force, which was flying them by remote control.

"As an old and not so bold pilot, I became more convinced that the four commercial jets were choreographed by a 'conductor' from a central source, namely, an airborne warning and control system (AWACS). They have the electronic capability to engage several aircraft simultaneously, knock out their on-board flight controls by EMP (electro-magnetic pulsing) and assume command and remote control of these targeted aircraft.

"As we consider all the options - and enemies - who performed this act of war, whether from China, Russia, an Islamic country, or from NATO, we must also consider that the enemy may be within the gates.

"If so, then we are dealing with high treason..."

Let me stress that I'm in no position to vouch for the validity of views and statements put forward in the foregoing excerpts. But in as much as they are the considered views and perspective of a group of experienced and knowledgeable American pilots, they deserve to be expressed and thoroughly investigated. The public indeed deserves nothing less than the truth. To date, these views and information have been pretty well suppressed.

Other Significant Excerpts

□ Nov. 30, 2001 e-mail carried a New Statesman's Nov. 26 report by John Pilger captioned 'The truths they never tell us'. Following is an excerpt:-

"The twin towers attacks provided Bush's Washington with both a trigger and a remarkable coincidence. Pakistan's former foreign minister, Niaz Naik, has revealed that he was told by senior American officials in mid-July that military action against Afghanistan would go ahead by the middle of October. The US secretary of state, Colin Powell, was then travelling in Central Asia, already gathering support for an anti-Afghanistan war 'coalition'. For Washington, the real problem with the Taliban was not human rights; these were irrelevant. The Taliban régime simply did not have total control of Afghanistan: a fact that deterred investors from financing oil and gas pipelines from the Caspian Sea, whose strategic position in relation to Russia and China and whose largely untapped fossil fuels are of crucial interest to the Americans. In 1998, Dick Cheney told oil industry executives: 'I cannot think of a time when we have had a region emerge as suddenly to become as strategically significant as the Caspian.'

□ A Sept. 30, 2001 e-mail we received, reads, in part:-

"United Press International of September 19, 2001 put a snake on the table in an abstract titled: 'Insider notes from United Press International for Sept. 19, 2001:-'

" 'Now we know why Washington was so quick to propose a global anti-terror coalition. A detailed plan for such an effort was already on the desk of the national security adviser, Condoleezza Rice, courtesy of her Israeli counterpart, Uzi Dayan, who was in Washington two weeks ago.

" 'Dayan proposed a special centre to tackle global terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction or WMD, to be based in and headed by the United States. Dayan said the centre's members should include the five permanent members of the UN Security Council - the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France. He advised that India, Canada, Israel and Germany also be part of the special center.'

"Please note: General Dayan presented his detailed plan two weeks before the attack on the WTC/Pentagon. What do we have here? A clairvoyant?"

□ It has been revealed that US authorities have uncovered a massive Israeli espionage ring in America, which has resulted in over a hundred arrests. This information is being suppressed by the major media networks - under government pressure.

□ Likewise, information is now out that the Mossad (the Israeli intelligence agency operators) seemed to have known in advance of an imminent strike against New York. And by strange coincidence the Israeli PM's planned trip to America for that September 11th week was cancelled at the last minute! Also, certain airline stocks and others that would be adversely affected by a terrorist attack performed some astonishingly strange and bizarre gymnastics in the days just before September 11! Some 'insiders' obviously knew something was imminent.

Space constraints preclude further discussion of the aspect of foreign espionage involvement in this September 11th terrorist attack. But we'll try to get back to this subject next month.

Back to the $64 questions

There are really two absolutely essential questions to consider and answer, if a major world war is to be avoided and genuine peace given a chance:

1. Who stands to gain from all-out war against the Islamic world?

2. Why is there such intense anger against the United States that men would give their lives to terrorise Americans?

Addressing the first question, Israel is possibly the only state that stands to gain from US war on the Moslem world. Every country Israeli leaders and Zionist advisors in Washington are urging President Bush to attack are enemies of Israel.

Addressing the second question: Since 1964, in just 38 years the US has invaded and engaged in war in no less than five countries - Vietnam, Somalia, Iraq, Yugoslavia, and now Afghanistan - and is now threatening further invasions. And just for good measure, it has been bombing Iraq off and on for the past several years, as well as dropping a few bombs on two or three 'recalcitrant' sovereign third-world states. The US stationed its army and air force in Saudi Arabia during its war against Iraq, and today, ten years later, has not yet withdrawn them! And even more insulting and insufferable to the Islamic world, Washington played a key role in support of the Zionist invasion and conquest of the Palestinians' homeland, and continues financing and supplying arms to the Israelis to this very day.

Result: Many third-world nationals, especially of Islamic countries, are very, very angry with the US. This, indeed, is the answer to the $64 question, which neither Washington nor the North American media care to acknowledge. Yet, it is the key to genuine and lasting peace and future world security.

Concluding: Terrorists and assassins must be hunted down and either killed or incarcerated. But that doesn't win the peace. It simply opens the opportunity to begin working out a lasting peace. And that won't be built on bombs and missiles, but on respect, compassion, charity and understanding and help.

KICKED OUT OF THEIR OWN COUNTRY

BRITISH PEOPLE have for a long time been lectured by their political masters that large-scale resettlement of foreign and non-white Commonwealth immigrants is inhumane, barbaric and, not least, logistically impossible. Those who have fallen for this propaganda would be well-advised to read a new book that has recently appeared. It is Microcosm: Portrait of a Central European City, and its author is Norman Davies.

"The exact numbers are disputed. Yet by 1948 the total number of Germans who had disappeared from their pre-war homes in the East approached 16 million.

"Official sources in Germany prefer figures of 12 million expelled and 1 million to 2 million casualties..."

The Germans were not the only ones to suffer; many Poles were victims of the same process. In compensation for their being uprooted from Eastern Polish areas regarded as being justified when the victims were Germans. The difference? Well, they had lost the war and had to be punished! Of course, had the Germans won the war and attempted a similar process of ethnic cleansing with defeated populations, that would have been a 'war crime'. Liberal opinion bows to no-one in its expertise in the art of hypocrisy.

The Germans complied with this massive uprooting process because they had no choice. There just were not any international pressure groups to argue their case. In addition, said Davies:-

"It is not hard to understand why post-war Germans were reluctant to discuss, let alone complain about, these terrible events. Denazification schemes and allied re-education programmes insisted that Germans should be made aware not only of their acquiescence in Nazi crimes but also of the rightness of the allied cause."

In other words, we're the good guys and you're the bad guys, and that justifies everything!

Davies continued:-

"The exercise was not psychologically compatible with alternative scenarios in which Germans figured prominently among the victims. Criticism of the Soviet Union, in particular, was so reminiscent of Nazi propaganda, which had shamelessly played on 'the Bolshevik threat', that critics could easily be denounced as neo-fascist extremists. In a moral climate of overwhelming guilt and disorientation, most Germans learnt to suppress their feelings and to avoid sensitive subjects.

"Hence it is only now at the start of the 21st century that their story can properly be told..."

Mass rape of women

The expulsions of these millions of Germans from their homelands, while given a quasi-legal status by the decisions of Potsdam, were accompanied – and indeed preceded – by rape of their women by the soldiers of the Red Army on an unprecedented scale. This is now being acknowledged in a number of new books and newspaper articles – in one case drawing an indignant retort from the Russian ambassador in London denying it ever happened. This is a quite understandable reaction prompted by a patriotism and national pride sadly lacking in most present-day British diplomats. However, it flies in the face of a vast array of factual evidence. Stalin had indeed encouraged his conquering troops to take German women as they pleased as part of the spoils of victory (German military personnel in the occupied lands, on the other hand, were strictly enjoined not to engage in sexual assaults of local women

Those who whine about the 'inhumanity' of a wholesale repatriation policy designed to remove ethnic minorities from Britain should study the history of what happened to upwards of 12 million Germans at the end of World War II. JEFFREY TURNER spotlights a revealing new book.

The city is Berlin, and the focus of the book is upon the dark days there in 1945, as Germany was being crushed between the armies of the Soviet Union and the western allies. In the case of the German capital, it was of course the former who got there first – aided by the decision of western allied commander Dwight D. Eisenhower to reject an attack plan suggested by Field Marshal Montgomery which could well have resulted in British and American troops beating them to it.

Davies' book was the subject of a revealing article by the author himself in The Sunday Times News Review of April 7th, which exposed certain truths well known to connoisseurs of World War II history but hitherto concealed from the public as a whole. The article was titled 'Europe's forgotten war crime', and prefaced by the statement that: "Millions of Germans were expelled from Eastern Europe at the end of the war in a huge exercise in ethnic cleansing that until now has been hidden from history..." Said Davies:-

"There can be no doubt... that the largest single act of ethnic cleansing in European history was carried out at the end of the second world war with the full approval of the western powers.

"At the Potsdam conference of 1945, Britain and America did not hesitate to support the inter-allied plan for clearing the entire German population from lands earmarked for Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary or Romania."

" 'National self-determination' was intended to reward nations that had supported the allied cause. They (sic) were not on offer for the benefit of the Germans, Austrians or Hungarians who had fought on the wrong side.

"As a result, the forcible expulsion of all Germans from Eastern Europe, which proceeded in stages from 1945 to 1947, assumed colossal proportions.

annexed by the Soviet Union, they were given lands that had previously been German. Poland was, in effect, picked up and moved a hundred or so miles westwards, though becoming smaller, overall, than it had been in 1939. The former German city of Breslau was cleared of Germans and settled mainly by Poles, thereupon becoming 'Wrocław'. Stettin, subject to the same process, was renamed 'Szczecin', and so on.

Germans 'punished'

Davies makes clear that this operation, wholly unacceptable to 'liberal' opinion when it affected most other nations, was

RED ARMY TROOPS BATTLE FOR BERLIN
In their wake came the rape and dismemberment of Germany and were promptly shot if they disobeyed). Said Davies:-

"Its (the Red Army's) policy was to shoot all German men and rape all females irrespective of nationality. NKVD (Soviet police) officials raised the alarm in Moscow, reporting that the Red Army's men were gang-raping Russian women whom they had just liberated from Nazi camps."

In other words, open season on Germans and other foreigners but not on one's own women! This, of course, was all played down at the time and for many years afterwards.

Principles pushed to background

Of all this ethnic cleansing, including that of the Poles, Davies protests:-

"Surely more could have been expected of the western democracies that were busy proclaiming that the war had been fought for freedom and justice? At the same time, western leaders were putting their names to documents that threw some of their allies, such as the Poles, to the wolves and which laid the defeated enemy open to unbridled revenge. Few people objected to the vile contention that all Germans, innocent or guilty, should pay for Nazi crimes. Such was the demonisation of Germany and such the blind admiration for 'Uncle Joe', whose armies had performed so heroically, that all our more serious principles were pushed into the background."

Of course, as the better informed have known for a long time, World war II in reality had little to do with 'principles' and everything to do with questions of power. Had there been, from the British point of view, some concrete power-objective in the whole business, an objective concerned with the defence or furtherance of vital British interests, all the criminal acts arising out of the war and the hatreds engendered in it might – the rape apart – have some slender rationale in the way of realpolitik. That could certainly be said in the Russians' case, but not at all in our own. The war impoverished us, bankrupted us and resulted in the catastrophic diminution of our status among the nations. And at the end of it all, its prosecutors could not even lay solid claim to the moral high ground – not at least now, when the smoke of wartime and post-war propaganda has cleared and the light of truth is shining through.

Terrible things were done in and after World War II – by both sides and with people on both sides as victims. Let's not go on deluding ourselves that all the crimes were committed by one side, for the overwhelming weight of evidence refutes it.

And after Britain's complicity in a huge process of forced resettlement – resettlement, moreover, of people from their own homelands, homelands whose soil their ancestors had tilled for centuries – let us hear no more nonsense about it being 'inhumane', least of all impossible, to repatriate from our own country populations of comparatively recent arrival, who came of their own free choice and about whose landing here we have never been

MADHOUSE BRITAIN

THE LANDLORD of a new pub about to open in Wood Green, North London, put in an application to the local authority (Labour) planning department for the pub to be called 'The Nelson' – in honour, he said, of Nelson Mandela. Unsurprisingly, the application was granted.

There were red faces on the council a short while afterwards when the pub's sign went up and it showed the victor of Trafalgar!

EDUCATION MINISTER Margaret Hodge has announced that Britain's top universities should discriminate in favour of students from state schools and 'disadvantaged' backgrounds when granting university places – even if the students' qualifications are inferior to those of applicants from public schools and more affluent backgrounds. This, apparently, is the Government's idea of how to deal with the lowered standards of British education!

A PARENT in the London suburbs found her nine-year-old son coming home from school one day proudly telling her he had learned the (Black) South African national anthem. The parent asked the boy if he knew the British national anthem. "What's that?" he replied.

"You know, God Save the Queen," the mother said, singing the first verse to jog his memory. "No, never heard of that," the boy retorted.

This story was sent to the Daily Mail and printed on the 24th March.

THE BOROUGH COUNCIL in Bury, Lancs., recently announced that it had engaged more than 100 staff to be trained to deal with complaints by local residents. Complaints about dirty streets, unreliable refuse collection

The man heading this special department, enjoying the grand title of 'community safety manager', is Mr. Mohammed Ayub.

JIMMY YEOMANS, an instructor in Essex Fire Service, got into terrible trouble with his bosses after he refused to pass a female recruit in a test for the service. The recruit, one Katy Allen, failed a vital part of the test involving the use of breathing apparatus. This did not meet the approval of the fire chiefs, who had undertaken to fulfill a certain quota of women firefighters regardless of ability and qualification. Miss Allen took the fire service to court and won £15,000 for 'sex discrimination'. Mr. Yeomans was forced to resign.

GRIFFIN SPEAKS AT BEXLEY

BNP chairman Nick Griffin was the guest speaker at the Bexley branch meeting held on Tuesday, the 26th March. The meeting was chaired by Bexley organiser James Seedon, who introduced Mr. Griffin.

The main focus of Mr. Griffin's speech was the local authority elections scheduled for the 2nd May. He spoke of the excellent canvass returns in the Oldham target wards and his hope of winning some seats. He went on to say that the party was growing at an unprecedented rate but that, due to its success, at least two media outlets were working on smear stories, possibly to be published before election day.

The meeting was attended by approximately 45 people, drawn from all corners of London and a few from further afield.

Mr. Griffin continued his address by telling those assembled that the Labour Party feared the BNP's potential and that large sections of the electorate were disaffected with the old order. He then informed the audience of the situation in Tipton, in the West Midlands, where one sitting Labour councillor is related to two of the Islamic terrorists being held in Cuba by US forces.

The second part of Mr. Griffin's speech concerned the new European Union laws being planned, whereby a British subject could be extradited to another member state for the crime of 'racism and xenophobia'. He also mentioned the sinister plan of the EU to split England into separate regions so as to erode further our sense of nationhood.

Colin Smith, one of the local North End ward candidates, then spoke briefly about the success of the Bexley election campaign.

The meeting ended with a lively question-and-answer session, and all members left with words of encouragement from the party chairman.

Competition: winning entry!

Last month we published the above photo of our revered prime minister, and invited readers to supply an appropriate caption. We are pleased to announce that there was a plentiful response. In the end we decided that the winning entry was the one coming from Mr. J.U. Wilhelmy, of Cromer, Norfolk. This said:-

Elevenses with pocket money

Junius is always ready to defend the rights of public figures persecuted by an unfeeling media. Presently we are incensed by the unwonted criticism of 'Lord' Wakeham, who, having resigned his post as Chairman of the Press Complaints Commission in the wake of the Enron collapse, will continue to draw his salary until September. Carping commentators point out that he will be paid £93,000 for doing nothing. Surely this is harsh. After all, he received his annual £156,000 just for stopping by at the office for a strenuous morning coffee twice a week, and we heard no complaints about that!

The power of the pen

We feel certain that, when Andrew Dismore appealed to Hendon's voters at the last General Election, he made much play about what he and his Labour Party would do for Britain. Never, could they have supposed, would he fail to mind his own business. But now this MP has stumbled onto a frightening situation in the Edgware Road, where copies of Mein Kampf, conveniently translated into Arabic, are available for a mere tanner at the newsagents. As a result, although in the normal way this paragon of the liberal left would condemn censorship, he is determined to confront the Home Secretary to see what can be done about the offending volumes. Are we then about to witness yet another 'burning of the books'? And surely, if there is what may perhaps be described as a surfeit of Arabs in and around the Edgware Road, that can hardly be Hitler's fault!

Have this one on us!

John Major, in case you've forgotten, was the ineffectual dithering disaster the nation suffered under before 'Bomber' Blair took over at Number 10; and, while on the strength of Major's record, he may well feel that someone is still out to get him, we doubt whether his person and possessions are at any greater peril than the those of the ordinary bloke who has a home, a family and his belongings to defend. The latter, of course, will be lucky if he sees a policeman a couple of times a year, unless he happens to exceed the speed limit by three m.p.h., or makes some remark round-the-clock police surveillance. And, unbelievably, the main residence is guarded by 41 officers, including armed units and operational support. Importantly then, it is not merely a question of money. Imagine what those scarce manpower resources could achieve if they were properly and effectively deployed where they are really needed: on the sink estates (their word not ours) which begrime the image of our once proud British Nation. My folk, when will you begin to learn?

A call for alms

My neighbour has had a most distressing missive pushed through his letter box: nothing less than a cry for help, and cash, from head Tory, Iain Duncan Smith. "It is important," says IDS, "that we expose every failure by the Government to deliver. But, as I keep stressing, we can't just be against things, we need to be for things." Now that really is innovative! And, what is more, IDS goes on to assure us that: "We are ready to bring in new ideas from all round the world (sic), as part of our policy renewal process we will learn from what works. We must continue to build up our credibility as a real alternative, so our chances of winning the next election, become stronger every day." Also, amongst several other astounding revelations, we learn that the Lib Dems "do not always practice what they preach." Good heavens! Has someone else rumbled Mr. Kennedy?

Looking at this extraordinary document as a whole, we would suspect that both grammar and punctuation were provided by that one eighth part of IDS that is said to be Japanese. However, our main concern is that some gullible folk will swallow this garbage and actually part with their money.

No sex please, we're Arabs

When asked why the West must topple Saddam Hussein, Foreign Secretary Jack Straw first came up with Iraq's alleged development and stockpiling of weapons of mass destruction. Pressed as to some other reason for starting a third world war, Mr. Straw, adopting that pious facial expression that we have all come to admire, referred to Saddam's inhuman treatment of his own folk and, in particular, the shooting of prostitutes.

Now, with the sex industry booming all over the Western World, it is difficult for us to come to terms with the concept of wretched women being executed just for using their bodies to turn a swift dinar. And Islamic Law does, we must admit, exhibit all the symptoms of male hypocrisy gone mad. But surely we are not intending to risk the lives of our servicemen just to bring Baghdad down to, or up to – according to your own perception of morality – the levels of permissiveness to be seen in London and New York.

A long day at the shops!

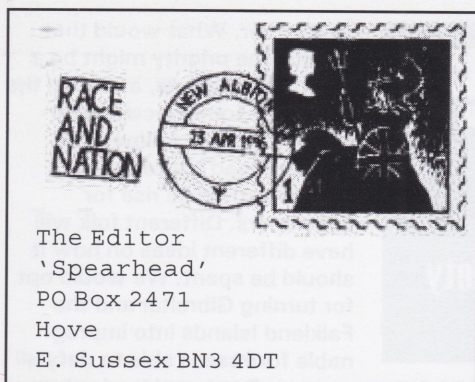

Just suppose that a good fairy could put an extra £25 billion into the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer every year. What would that mean? The priority might be a few new hospitals, and then the next year some decent refurbished schools, followed by massive road improvements and a worthwhile rise for pensioners. Different folk will have different ideas on how it should be spent. We would opt for turning Gibraltar and the Falkland Islands into impregnable fortresses able to defy all comers. But one thing is absolutely clear. It could be available to us any time, because the quoted figure represents the annual cost to Britain of being in the European Union and paying the salaries of its 23,000 utterly superfluous civil servants. Come on you Brits, the farce has gone on long enough. We need the BNP to get us out and back to sanity.

Lest we forget

Twenty years ago, Argentine forces occupied the Falkland Islands, which are 480 miles north-east of Cape Horn, almost 260 miles from the Argentine mainland, and absolutely nothing to do with Argentina. Their spurious claim to the islands is about as valid as Thailand contending that it has a right to the Isle of Man. The trespassers, as we know, did not last long. In a bloody conflict, our travel-weary troops did what the nation expected of them. They kicked out the aggressors at a cost of some 250 British lives plus several wounded. At the time, a few traitorous, wicked men, amongst them Dennis (now 'Lord') Healey, condemned the relief of our kith and kin, while most sane folk thanked God for the courage and determination of our service personnel.

But, incredibly, over the past few years we have noticed more and more Argentine wine becoming available through the mail or in the supermarkets and wine stores. Globalist trade is, after all, not the least bit interested in the survival of a thriving community comprised of British stock, and quite unconcerned that the enemy still covets and threatens our historic possession. We understand that currently the Argentine economy is going through a bad patch. Let us therefore remember the young lives that were sacrificed for the Falklands and do our damndest to make it get worse. For a start, we can watch out for grape variety Malbec and leave this muck on the shelves!

SIR: Leading the latest news is a report that the IRA has put a second 'significant' cache of illegal weapons into permanent(?) storage as a further gesture of support for the so-called 'peace process' in Ulster. We hear the Prime Minister, Northern Ireland Secretary and Irish Republican officials all but congratulating the IRA for its statesmanship and insisting that this event marks 'a forward movement' in the province. One could as well refer to the British Expeditionary Force's 'advance' on Dunkirk in 1940!

The IRA has always referred to itself as waging an armed struggle to detach Ulster from the United Kingdom. So if the struggle is indeed in the process of disarming itself, we can only conclude that the IRA is now assured of 'forward movement' without recourse to arms. Such assurance could only come from the British Government – so we may regard the 'peace process' as a face-saving Whitehall euphemism for progressive surrender of Ulster to the Irish Republic.

In the liberal lexicon, 'peace process' and 'negotiated settlement' are synonyms for surrender, and they are euphemisms for cowardice and treason.

SIR: The American policy for fighting terrorism is ridiculous. Sending armies to the Middle East and other Third World areas will result in the loss of American lives and only fuel further Islamic hatred and aggression against the West.

The disappearance of bin Laden and the failure to eradicate Saddam Hussein are examples of the futility of American policy. Islam and its evil message will not go away.

The Koran tells Muslims that it is OK, and in fact a duty, to kill non-Muslims and take their lands and property. This message is loudly expounded by the Mullahs in every mosque in the world. The only solution to the spread of this poison is a policy of exclusion. There are 7 million Muslims in the USA and 2 million in the UK. All these should be deported back to their countries of origin in the interests of national security. We should allow no further trade with Islamic countries, and we should halt all movements of Muslims to the West.

Finding non-oil-based technology is an important need, as it is oil alone that has given Islamic countries power and mobility. This is the only way to solve the Islamic threat. You cannot take on vast numbers of peoples in Third World countries in endless overseas wars. Look at the colossal costs involved in the war in Afghanistan alone. This situation will just go on and on and become part and parcel of every battle arena that America visits around the world, and will involve her European allies as well.

SIR: I am a reader of both Spearhead and Identity. However, I do not subscribe to Identity to read about the views of Sikhs, Hindus or any other ethnic minorities which our treacherous politicians have inflicted on my country.

Rajinder Singh is motivated entirely by self-interest. He isn't singing from the "I'm-an-ally" hymnbook. In the 1970s and early 1980s the areas surrounding Heathrow were overrun by Sikhs and Hindus and their enormous families, all basking in the special privileges bestowed upon them by a series of treacherous home secretaries. Now Rajinder Singh's problem is that he and his people, in turn, find themselves overrun and outbred by Muslims.

SIR: In an otherwise excellent article by Antony Milne (April Spearhead) I suggest a small correction. America was not, in fact, named after Amerigo Vepucci; that honour belongs to another.

The long-standing assertion concerning the link with Vespucci – frequently repeated because it was initiated by a 16th century German cartographer – is historically incorrect. It was the sole prerogative of Royal persons to have places named after their Christian names, for example Alberta, Carolina, Maryland, Georgetown, and so on. In the case of commoners, the surname was always used: hence Hudson bay, Melbourne, Darwin, Jacksonville. Any deviation from this rule in the 15th and 16th centuries would have been regarded as lèse majesté.

However, there is an obvious contender for the honour of giving his name to the country we call America. The expedition to the New World inaugurated by the Genoese explorers John and Sebastian Cabot in 1497 was managed in England by a Bristol merchant whose ancestors probably hailed from Merric in Somerset. It was this man who raised the money – personally donating the lion's share, built the two ships and employed the crews. His name was Richard Amerric!

SIR: I must write in response to S. Whiteley from Manchester (letter in March issue). First, out of all the thousands of Taliban prisoners only the most evil are sent to the camp in Cuba where their treatment has been so strongly criticised. Let's not forget that these men would gladly crash their own transport planes to kill westerners.

I would also like to point out that an attack on Zionism would be total political suicide! With Zionists in control of the media, they would relish our being 'anti-Semitic' so that they could crucify us on TV. Nationalists in the UK have been attacking Zionists for years and getting nowhere. The majority of TV viewers have no idea of what a Zionist actually is, so if we try to tell people that Zionists are taking over the world that would make us a laughing stock.

SIR: The incredible turn-out of members of the public paying their respects to the Queen Mother must give hope to patriots everywhere that there is still a great love of Britain and her traditions among ordinary people.

Such people, when they see others doing what is right to sustain our traditions – those which the Queen Mother worked so hard to serve – they should surely support our movement.

By the way, I did not notice many black faces among those queues!
P. ELVIDGE (Mrs.)

SIR: Unaccountably, the football authorities at Wembley have just allowed a far-out extremist group to hold a meeting there. This group acts as an apologist for some of the worst racially-motivated violence in the world. It is called the Zionist Association.

The rally was called to give full backing to Ariel Sharon following the bad publicity over the Jenin massacre, when hundreds of Palestinian old men, women and children were buried under piles of rubble after days of rocket attacks.

The audience watched a video message from Sharon, whose lengthy CV of murder and mayhem includes the massacres at Kibbiya, Sabra, Chatila and now Jenin. Incredibly (or perhaps not), a special letter from Tony Blair was read out at the rally.

One wonders whether the PM's hectic schedule of visits all over the world allows him the time to send messages to other religious groups, such as the Mormons or Plymouth Brethren.

SIR: According to a recent BBC report, a special task force has been set up to tackle the problem of black pupils under-achieving in Britain's schools.

The pretext for this move is that black pupils get the worst exam results and are six times more likely than white pupils to be expelled.

Two thousand black parents and teachers attended a conference in London in March aimed at exploring ways to improve the performance of black pupils.

One of the proposals that the conference approved is a 'Race Relations Amendment Act', which means that all public bodies will have to have a written policy on race and equality.

Does this mean legislation to get teachers to give better marks to Blacks?

Fine East Herts. meeting

EAST HERTFORDSHIRE branch of the British National Party staged its best meeting for several years when Spearhead editor and BNP founder John Tyndall was the main guest speaker on the 21st April.

An audience of some 65-70 people, mostly local, were present when organiser and local election candidate John Cope opened the meeting. The first speaker was Bob James, who contrasted the big turnout of the real British people at the Queen Mother's funeral with the alienness of so many of the areas around the nation's capital.

He was followed by John Morse, who urged the need not to compromise on essential nationalist principles.

John Tyndall, as the final speaker, spoke of the hysteria with which the Labour Party had reacted to the BNP's local government election challenge and the fear that this demonstrated. He analysed the miserable record of Labour, saying that the present government was one of crooks, confidence tricksters, sleazeballs, perverts and traitors. Labour had helped destroy a great empire; it had wrecked British industry; it was busy enslaving Britain to Europe; and it was flooding our country with Third World immigrants, who had no place here. Everything it touched it had turned to ruin.

Tyndall compared the situation of the indigent people of Britain with the defenders of Rorke's Drift. They had no option left but to fight; there was nowhere where they could run..

The meeting ended in great enthusiasm and an excellent collection raised £360.

ESTABLISHMENT GOES HYSTERICAL OVER PARTY'S CHALLENGE

OPPONENTS of the British National Party have been going completely ballistic in the run-up to May's local government elections. Smear leaflets distributed by left-wing groups, including the Lottery-financed Searchlight organisation, have been going out in big numbers, while even leading political figures have been joining in the clamour to undermine the party's support.

BLUNKETT
Wrote special article attacking BNP

for the tensions in our multi-racial towns and cities. Laughably, Blunkett spoke in his article of the way the BNP allegedly 'distorts' the truth in order to get its message across – a sure case of the pot calling the kettle black, for there are no greater 'distorters' of the truth than Labour politicians, particularly when they are trying to defend the

The Guardian newspaper of April 11th carried an article by no less an eminence than Home Secretary David Blunkett, wailing that 'The far right is the enemy' (the title of the article). The theme of the Blunkett article was that it is 'racists' like the BNP, not the lamentable government of which he is part, who are to blame mess they have made of immigration and to blacken people, like the BNP, who oppose their policies.

Not content with printing Blunkett's article, The Guardian gave it an extra plug elsewhere in the same issue, and reported a leaked Labour memo disclosing that MPs on the party's parliamentary campaign team had been asked to spend up to three evenings a week ringing voters in seats contested by the BNP to "warn them of the threat posed by the extremists."

Two days later, a very moderate and reasonably worded letter of reply was printed in The Guardian from the BNP's press officer Dr. Phill Edwards. This caused fresh hysteria from the party's opponents, with an article two days further on by one Randeep Ramesh demanding that the paper – and the rest of the press – should give no space to the BNP. With the screaming heading 'This voice should not be heard', Ramesh argued: "We do not give Holocaust deniers a slot on the letters page, so why should other racists get one?"

Meanwhile, the Jewish Chronicle of the 15th March announced that Labour Party general secretary David Triesman had promised a 'gloves-off' battle to stop the BNP winning seats.

SPEARHEAD SUPPORT FUND

Income from the sales of our magazine is not enough to cover full production and administrative costs. We therefore rely on regular donations from our supporters so that we may remain solvent.

Also, because of the controversial nature of the opinions expressed in these columns, it is impossible to induce wholesale distributors to handle the magazine. Hence our need for additional financial support.

Please send all contributions to Spearhead, PO Box 2471, Hove, East Sussex BN3 4DT. Please note that receipts are not normally sent for donations of less than £10 unless specifically requested – in which case an SAE would be much appreciated. Thanks.

THE PATRIOTISM THAT IS NOT ENOUGH

The picture here shows a small part of the vast crowds who queued to pay their last respects as the body of the Queen Mother lay in state in Westminster last month. Many newspaper writers described these crowds as representing the true people of Britain – loyal and patriotic by contrast with the politicians of New Labour and the lefties of the BBC.

That was broadly true. These people constituted the best of our nation. Their huge turn-out was a sign of their loyalty and respect for our traditions, of which the Queen Mother was seen as a symbol.

But loyalty and patriotism demand more than just this. Loyalty and patriotism require that people come forward and fight for their nation when it is in peril – whether the peril be the threat of armed invasion from without or subversion and treason within. Britain today is in real peril – the peril of destruction by politicians who simply do not want her to survive: politicians who would sell us out to Europe, who are allowing an alien invasion and the destruction of our culture and heritage through 'political correctness'. Patriotism demands that people mobilise together to fight this peril. By far the best way to do this is to join and help the British National Party. Will you volunteer?
